THE PATRIOTISM OF ABOLITIONISTS.

If ever a set of men dismissed the little common sense which nature gave them, and determined to make their way through the world with empty sconces, it appears to be the more fanatical of the Abolitionists.

In their efforts to extend the area of freedom, they seem to be willing to cast aside prudence, self-respect, and patriotism, and like a Maylay, delirious with opium, stab right and left, at friend or foe, careless of consequences, and intent only upon producing general disorder, and uncompromising hostility.

What have these men done for a series of years but divide churches, convulse communities, instigate popular commotion, and servile rebellion? As a political party, they have been faithless to their professions, and while ostensibly contending for the rights of the bondman, have been instrumental in not only perpetuating Slavery, but in extending its desolating dominion over large tracts of country, and placing the free States at the footstool of those which look with jealousy at the prosperity which white labor secures, and are striving to wrench away the staff upon which the Northern manufacturer leans.

How far they have benefitted the age or the nation, by their insane struggles after political power—how far they have inspired their fellow-citizens with confidence in their ability to direct or govern where they have obtained it, and how much authority communities are willing to yield them, let the whole people who consider, and treat them as aliens to republicanism, and as strangers to all liberal feelings, answer!

The want of good faith which has characterized their behaviour to others, has, on various occasions, been manifested among themselves; they have quarreled, divided, and fought in their own ranks, and have, at times, had only a single bond of union, and that was to accomplish as much mischief as possible.

As a nation, we should have been less stigmatized, had the Abolitionists confined their blind fury to their own country, and their ebullitions of treason to their domestic presses; but these, it seems, do not afford sufficient scope for their malignity or fiery enthusiasm. They must go abroad to publish their infamous manifestos against their own Government, and from a foreign shore, hurl defiance, contumely and hatred, against the land already sullied by having given birth to such unnatural children.

The standard bearers of abolition, the trumpeters of the grand army of destructives, desire the dissolution of this Union, for what purpose heaven only knows, unless to glut their philanthropic eyes with anarchy and bloodshed, although they may hypocritically deny it. In confirmation of this, if, indeed, it were wanting, from their various tracts and speeches, on this side of the water, we make the following extracts from a letter, written by HENRY C. WRIGHT, of Philadelphia, to the London Spectator, from Roseneath, under date of August 31st. He says:

I am an enemy to the American Union, and seek its dissolution! because, in the language of John Quincy Adams, the preservation, propagation, and perpetuation of Slavery, constitute the vital and animating spirit of the National Government. * * * *

I would array against the American Union, the moral and religious sentiment of the world, and by this means abolish American Slavery. * * * * *

If that compact continues, the whole continent will, ere long, become a vast slave market. Down with every Government and Church, which cannot exist without enslaving men! * * * * * *

But why seek aid from Britain to overthrow the American Union? Simply because that aid is needed; and because the people of this country have a right to give it. * * * * * *

It is the duty of Great Britain to use all their moral, social, and intellectual influence, "to disseminate among American citizens disaffection and disloyalty" to their slave-breeding, slave-trading, and slaveholding Government, and I shall do what in me lies, to excite them to a faithful discharge of this duty! * * * *

Let the people of this nation combine, and by 'Christian, peaceful, and bloodless means,' seek the dissolution of that slave-breeding, and slave-trading Union; let them bar their pulpits, and their communions against every man-stealer from that land of Republican whips and chains; let every slaveholder be treated as a common thief and pickpocket should be treated. Because I love liberty, and abhor Slavery—because I believe hypocrisy, injustice, and despotism, have not a more efficient friend, and freedom a more potent enemy than the American Union, therefore I call upon all the friends of human rights in Britain, to band together, and bring their concentrated moral influence to bear upon it, to effect its dissolution.

For thus seeking to array the combined moral and social power of Great Britain against the American Union, I am called a traitor to that Government. So be it! "Slave-breeding, slave-trading, and slaveholding form the whole foundation" of that Government. I must be a traitor to it, or my God. To acknowledge my allegiance to it would be to renounce my allegiance to the "King Eternal."

This addle-headed declaimer, in various parts of this Union-destroying epistle, asserts that the dissolution of the Confederacy can take place without bloodshed, and that the people of Great Britain can interfere with our domestic affairs without provoking hostilities. Were we all non-resistants, as we suppose he is, why, then to be sure other nations might dispose of us to their liking; and had the Americans no more blood in their veins, than he has brains in his worthless skull, there would, certainly, in the worst of circumstances, be no expenditure of the vital fluid!

SLAVERY.

The frequent collisions between citizens of the slaveholding States, and those of the free States, tend to array the different portions of the country against each other, and to endanger the Union. Nothing so seriously threatens the existence and perpetuity of our Republican Confederacy, as the unwarranted efforts that are made by a portion of the citizens of the free States, to interfere with the slave property of the South, and the high-handed measures sometimes resorted to by the people of the South, to defeat and counteract the efforts to endanger and impair the value of that description of property. The rights of the slave States to continue and maintain the institution of Slavery, and of the owners of slaves to retain and use that description of property, are as well secured by plain, constitutional provisions, as any other right that exists; but still there are a large number of persons who are so firmly and deeply opposed to Slavery, that they think that all legal and constitutional provisions in favor of Slavery are void, and ought to be disregarded. Men entertaining such opinions will ever be ready to violate the rights of slaveholders, and laws of the slave States. The systematic efforts of the Anti-Slavery men to disturb the slave population of the South, and the continued efforts of individuals to induce slaves to abscond, and to aid them in effecting their escape, are producing a state of feeling that menaces the Union more than any other cause. There are a large number of the people of the free States who, although they do not approve of Slavery, still are desirous of respecting all the constitutional rights of the slave States, and slave owners, and disapprove of the incendiary efforts that have been made to sow discord in our Confederacy. On the patriotism and firmness of this class of people, and the forbearance and moderation of the people of the slave States, depends the safety of our present constitutional Republic, for it has been admitted on all hands that the dissolution of our Union would be speedily followed by great changes in our system of Government, that would be very unfavorable to the enjoyment of liberty. The existence of a number of rival Republics, each having their separate armies, navies, and fortifications, would lead to border wars and conflicts, which would raise up a race of military heroes, and the consequence would be that liberty could not long survive. All efforts to produce discord between the different portions of this Confederacy, tend to its dissolution, and ultimately to endanger the liberty of the people.

Mr. GIDDINGS'S STATEMENT.

Mr. BRUCE:—In replying to the note of Mr. Brown, contained in the "Whig" of the 19th instant, I will avail myself of your indulgence, to state my views somewhat at length in regard to the doctrines of the American Anti-Slavery Society, as expressed by its agents, Miss Kelley, Messrs. Jones, Stebbins, and Foster, who have lately addressed the people in this region on the subject of Slavery. I am led to do this from the fact that some partisan papers in this part of the State appear to regard the coincidence of views between myself and the American Anti-Slavery Society, as a matter of some importance. That Society embraces some of the ablest jurists, the most devoted patriots, and purest philanthropists of our nation, and I see no reason to depart from any doctrine which I have entertained, and labored for years to establish, merely for the reason that such men hold the same principles.

The agents of that society, while in this place, avowed the object and ulterior design of that association to be, "the total separation of the people of the free States, from the guilt and disgrace of sustaining and upholding Slavery." It is surely unnecessary for me to inform your readers, that to attain that same object I have written, and spoken, and labored for years. And I doubt whether a man of intelligence, belonging to any party, can be found in this portion of Ohio, who will so far disregard his own character, as publicly to declare himself desirous of remaining contaminated with the guilt; and of sharing in the disgrace of supporting that institution.

In order to effect our separation from the guilt of sustaining Slavery, the American Anti-Slavery Society proposes an immediate severance of all church connection with those who breed mankind for market, or hold their fellow-men in degrading servitude.

It is most unquestionably true, that the churches of nearly all denominations of Christians within the free States lend a most powerful and efficient support to the institution of Slavery, by admitting slaveholders, and sometimes slave-dealers to preach in our pulpits; and by receiving to our communion and Christian fellowship lay members of Southern churches, who actually breed mankind for market, and those who are stained with the guilt of holding and of buying and selling slaves. I know of no obligation resting upon our churches to continue such connection.

I think the guilt of our church members in not having acted on this subject, is far less than was imputed to them by those agents of the Society to whom I refer. The guilt of our church members must be proportioned to their intelligence on the subject. For if a church-member be not conscious that Slavery is wrong, or not sensible that he is aiding its support, his guilt must be far less than it would be were he to bestow his influence in favor of it while fully impressed with the extent of his enormity.

The institution of Slavery is productive of more licentiousness and crime in the United States, than all other causes combined. It actually sacrifices nearly thirty thousand human lives within this nation annually. If any minister of the gospel, who either apologizes for Slavery, or attempts to justify it from Scripture, or advocates our continuance in church-fellowship with those whose hands are thus stained with human gore, denies or doubts these facts, I will endeavor to give him satisfactory evidence of their reality. Now, Sir, if our church members were fully conscious, that by admitting slaveholders to our communion, we encourage and sustain these crimes; that we justify those murders, and actually say to the world, that those who commit them are good and worthy brethren in our churches; I do not think they would long remain in church-fellowship with them. I, therefore, impute the apathy of our churches more to a want of information in regard to facts, than I do in the want of moral feeling, or of Christian principle. I believe the proper remedy to consist principally in the promulgation of facts among the members of our churches, rather than by immediately separating from them. But if the majority of any or all of the churches persist in continuing their fellowship with those who are thus contaminated with the guilt of slaveholding, then I have no doubt the time will come, and that too at no very distant day, when those members who wish to promote gospel-purity will be compelled to leave such churches.

It was to me a most startling assertion made by one of the agents of the American Anti-Slavery Society, that there "were ten professed ministers of the Gospel, who uphold Slavery as a Divine institution, where there was one Whig politician that dared to advance such a sentiment." I was at first disposed to doubt the correctness of the assertion; but upon examination I was compelled to admit its perfect accuracy. I have nothing to say in extenuation of the guilt of that class of clergymen. They have the means of knowing the truth; and if they willfully shut their eyes to the documentary evidence before the nation, and obstinately persevere in rejecting information, their guilt becomes so apparent that I will attempt no excuse for it. It may appear somewhat out of place for me to speak upon matters relating to the Church; but I think at least I shall be excused by those clergymen, who have labored so zealously to show our people the sin of voting for a slaveholder, while they themselves still hold in Christian fellowship, and administer the holy sacrament to those who buy and sell the image of our God.

The American Anti-Slavery Society, as a further means of separating our people of the free States from the guilt of sustaining Slavery, propose an immediate dissolution of our political connection with the slaveholding States of this Union. On this point I disagree with them. I think that all intelligent men will say that to enforce the constitutional rights of the free States, would prove as fatal to the institution of Slavery, as it would to dissolve the Union. Our people are more ready to support the Constitution, than they are to separate from our Union with the slaveholding States. As a matter of policy, therefore, I have felt it my duty to urge a maintenance of the Constitution; feeling a perfect assurance that the very existence of Slavery depends, not upon the Constitution but upon its violation,—not upon the support which our people are bound by the Constitution to lend to it, but upon the support which has been extorted from them by violation of the Constitution. When the day shall arrive that Northern men will insist upon their rights, and refuse to contribute the substance acquired by their toil for the maintenance of Southern Slavery,—that scourge of our land will cease, and ours will become indeed a free people.

In my political duties, I am bound by the same rule as in my church relations. My first duty is to promulgate facts—to lay truth before the people. If the great mass of our citizens of the free States, were fully conscious that they are involved in the moral guilt of thirty thousand murders every year; that the continuance of these murders and other crimes attendant upon Slavery, cost the people of the free States annually more money than we pay for all the internal improvements of our State; for our lake harbors, for the support of light-houses, and for the improvement of our river navigation:—were they further sensible that this money was extorted from them without the shadow of constitutional authority; with no more color of legal right than is possessed by the highwayman who compels his victim to deliver his purse,—I think they would stand forth united in resisting further outrages. I believe they can be induced to do this in less time than they can be induced to dissolve the Union with the slave States. As a question of policy, without regard to any other consideration, I prefer this mode of vindicating our rights. On this point consists the most important difference between the views entertained by the members of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and those which I entertain.

As to the character of the Constitution, I differ from those members of the American Anti-Slavery Society with whom I have conversed. I think a true construction of that instrument gives far less protection to Slavery than the construction which they put upon it. I cannot say that the clause respecting fugitive slaves; that which prohibits Congress from abolishing the Slave-Trade until 1808; and that which gives to the slave States a representation in Congress proportioned to the number of slaves they hold, were not concessions made by the Northern States in favor of Slavery. This fact is perfectly evident from the debates in the convention which framed the Constitution,—in the conventions of the several States at their adoption of the Constitution; by all contemporaneous history; by the uniform construction given to it by the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judicial departments of the Federal Government, and by those of each of the several States; by all jurists, statesmen, and legislators, from the day of its adoption to the present day, that it appears to me difficult for any intelligent man to believe our Constitution to be an "Anti-Slavery document." There can be no doubt that the framers of that instrument intended to grant certain privileges to the slaveholding interest. But it was early seen that these provisions carried into full practice, could lend but an uncertain, and at best a temporary support to Slavery.—The slaveholding power, therefore, saw the necessity of usurping undelegated authority, which had not been granted by the Constitution, but which was in direct opposition to, and a violation of that instrument. In exact proportion as the slaveholding States have usurped power, they have violated the Constitution, and encroached upon the sacred rights of the free States. Thus, it is a usurpation of power to appropriate money collected in the free States to support Slavery, and it is as much a violation of the Federal Constitution, as it is an encroachment upon our rights;—and in proportion as these usurpations become flagrant, in the same proportion will the Constitution be violated, and the interests and the honor of the free States be outraged.

Much is said as to the character of the framers of the Constitution. They unquestionably made concessions in favor of the slaveholding interest. This would not be done at the present time; but had we lived at that period, surrounded by the circumstances with which they were surrounded, it is not unlikely that we might have voted for its adoption. But I do not see that our opinions of the Constitution ought in any way to be effected by the character of its framers. If it be defective, let it be amended. To say that it is imperfect, is no impeachment of the integrity of its framers. They were doubtless honest, patriotic men, and did what they then thought best for the country; but were they now living, and had witnessed the outrages committed upon the Constitution by the slaveholding power, I have no idea they would frame another compact, bestowing upon the slave States the unequal influence given them by our present Constitution. The fatal error into which they were drawn, was the adoption of that clause which gives to the slave States a political power proportioned to the slaves they hold in bondage. Slavery and freedom are antagonisms. They are irreconcilably opposed to each other. Southern statesmen are accustomed to legislate for Slavery and oppression: Northern statesmen for freedom and the rights of man. The interests of slave labor controls the Southern policy,—that of free labor dictates the North. Hence, the error of giving unequal powers to the slaveholding interest.

That clause of the Constitution to which I refer gave an undue and disproportionate power in the Federal Government to the slaveholding interest.—From the fatal hour of its adoption to the present day, that power has been exerted against the rights of the free States—against the very Constitution which gives it—and against the liberties of mankind. Under this clause of the Constitution, Slavery was introduced into the Government as an element of political power in the slave States. It has spread its virus into every department of its administration. Its poison has been diffused through every vein and artery of the body politic; it has corrupted the fountains of life; its scirrhus tumors are fast gathering upon the vitals of the nation. Speedy and efficient measures alone can save the Republic from that dissolution to which it is rapidly approaching. With this unjust and unequal influence, the slave interest has usurped to itself powers above the Constitution, and trampled upon the rights of the free States with perfect impunity. Seizing upon the power of Government, at an early day, it discarded the Constitution which was adopted "for the purpose of securing the blessings of liberty"—and wielded our national influence to perpetuate the curse of American Slavery. Before the haughty vaporings of Southern members of Congress, Northern statesmen, unassuming in their manners, and retiring in their habits, were early accustomed to cower. The history of our Government is an exhibition of continual arrogance on the part of the South, and of constant submission on the part of the North; of Southern encroachment and of Northern surrender. It is a most humiliating fact that the rodomontades of Southern men, accompanied by a display of canes, pistols, and bowie-knives, silenced debate in Congress on all subjects where Slavery was concerned. If the rights of the free States happened to come in contact with the interests of Slavery, all discussion in favor of the former and against the latter was silenced; while Southern members, with bullying swagger, would declare the glories and blessings of "the peculiar institution," and look unutterable contempt upon those whom they insultingly term "Northern doughfaces." If a Northern member, under a sense of duty, were to attempt a reply, he was compelled to do it in such language as was dictated by Southern slaveholders. If he gave vent to his feelings of self-respect, or spoke the language of freedom, he was instantly silenced by Southern insolence aided by Northern poltroonry. While sitting in the Hall of Representatives, and compelled for hours to listen to language insulting to every citizen of our free States, without the privilege of reply, I have deeply felt the degradation to which the people of the North were subjected.

The people of this Congressional district are fully aware that in 1842, I stated by way of resolutions, my views, denying the constitutional right of the Federal Government to involve the people of the free States in the support of the coast-wise slave-trade. For this expression of my views, I was publicly censured and driven from my seat in Congress. Indeed, so servile had some Northern members of Congress become, that they voted to censure me for daring to assert the constitutional rights of the free States. Papers politically friendly to me spoke of the act as imprudent, and others characterized it as presumptuous. So vitiated had Northern sentiment become in respect to Slavery, that a free expression of opinion in regard to the crime of that institution, was scarcely tolerated in our social circles. The dissemination of truth in relation to Slavery, was obstructed in every mode which slaveholding ingenuity could invent. Mobs were collected: the laws of the Federal and State Governments were set at defiance: Southern post-offices were violated: private correspondence exposed: printing presses destroyed: Northern citizens traveling in Southern States were seized by mob violence, imprisoned, and scourged: and in some instances life itself was taken, to prevent the promulgation of truth. Indeed, while I now write, intelligence has reached our village of a slaveholding mob convened in an adjoining State, for the purpose of preventing by violence the publication of a paper devoted to the cause of truth and humanity; and in order to silence the tongue and paralyze the pen of one of the truest and most devoted patriots of the age. Languishing upon a bed of sickness from which he was unable to rise, a conclave of cowards, headed by a late member of Congress, seized upon the opportunity to display their valor. It was a most fortunate moment, when the physical debility of their victim held out to them a sure guaranty of personal safety. Never did I realize more fully the truth, that "Slavery is an unmitigated curse," than while I now write. It is truly a curse to the master—a curse to the slave—a curse to the States in which it exists—and a bitter curse to the free States of this Union. Rather than see these outrages continued, I would gladly see our union with the slaveholding States dissolved.

No greater insult could be offered to the dignity of our free States, than to tax them for the recapture and return of Southern slaves who have fled from their masters: No greater outrage than this could have been perpetrated upon the Constitution. Yet the people of Ohio have paid for arresting and returning such fugitives at the rate of eighty thousand dollars per head. We have been taxed for the purchase of blood-hounds, to act as auxiliaries to our army, in leading them to the hiding-places of women and children, who have sought liberty in the deep gloom of the forests. Equally insulting to our character, and subversive of the Constitution has been the employment of our army, in shooting and butchering defenceless women and children, for no other cause than their attachment to liberty. This deep disgrace, these damning crimes, have been brought upon us by our union with the slaveholding States. Not in pursuance of the Constitution, but in subversion of that instrument. With my hands thus clotted, and dripping with the blood of slaves, I cannot reverence a union with those States that have thus involved us in such overwhelming guilt, and disgrace. For the union with those slave States, who have thus defeated the great and paramount objects of our confederation; subverted the Constitution, waged war against the rights of mankind, I entertain no attachment. Give me constitutional Union, or give me dissolution.

If we look to the position which our own State holds to the Union, we shall find but little to cheer our hopes, or cherish our pride. Our soil is often polluted with slaveholding violence. Neither the dignity of our State, nor the Federal Constitution has been able to protect our people from the slaveholding rapacity of adjoining States. Our beloved citizens have been seized, dragged from our territory, and sold into Southern Slavery. When the perpetrators of these acts have been demanded, under provisions of our Federal Constitution, such demand has been rejected with a contemptuous sneer, by slaveholding Governors, and our State now remains humbled, and as remediless as the savage tribes of Africa, on whom like depredations are committed. Colored people have been shot down, like brutes, within our own territory, in the presence of our own people: our soil has drank their blood, but their slaveholding murderers, returning to their own State, have bidden defiance to our laws, and spurned with contempt the obligation of our political compact. The people of the slave States have become so habituated to commit these outrages, and our citizens have become so accustomed to endure them, that free white inhabitants of our State have recently been kidnapped from our territory, and taken by lawless violence to an adjoining State, under pretence that they had done acts in Ohio which were opposed to the laws of our sister State. The Judiciary of that State, having investigated the subject, has approved the act, and remanded our kidnapped citizens to prison, where they now remain. I have not time to hint further at the usurpations of the slaveholding interest, or at the outrages and insults heaped upon the people of the free States. I have said enough to show that our union with the slave States has proven destructive to the interests, the dearest rights, and the sacred honor of the free States; fatal to our Constitution, and disastrous to the "rights of man." Are unbridled licentiousness, degrading oppression, violence and bloodshed, a curse? then has our union with the slaveholding States, brought that curse upon us. Are the millions of enemies within our Government, held in subjection only by physical force, a curse? Then has our union with the slave States brought that curse upon us. Are war, rapine, and human butchery, a curse? Then has that curse been brought upon us by our union with the slave States. To impress these facts upon the minds of our people, has been an important object of my public efforts for the last ten years. From my first entrance into Congress, to the present day, I have embraced all proper occasions to exhibit the outrages and insults heaped upon the free North by the slaveholding power. The slave States certainly have no claim on us further to share the disgrace, or to bear the burdens, or to participate in the guilt, or to fight the battles of an institution execrated by civilized man, and cursed of God.—Rather than do these, I would dissolve our political connection with those States. I would maintain the Constitution in all its bearings. Although our fathers made a hard bargain for the North, one that is injurious to our interests, and our honor, yet would I abide by it. Beyond that, I would not go. I would yield not a single constitutional right of our State to save a union that has so long, and so bitterly oppressed and insulted us. I would maintain our rights under the Constitution, leaving the Union to be continued or dissolved, as the slave States shall prefer. And I rejoice that the progress of public sentiment is such as to enable every man to look forward to a point of time, not far in the future, when the constitutional rights of the free States will be vindicated, regardless of the effect which such vindication may have upon our union with the slaveholding States. God speed the day.

But I regard all discussion concerning the continuance of our present union as a work of supererogation. Present indications leave no doubt that it will be dissolved within the coming six months: indeed, it is announced by some of our papers, that a new union is already formed with a foreign slaveholding Government. Our army is already in Texas, in all probability now engaged in another war to sustain Slavery. This last crowning act of slaveholding perfidy, is attended with one extenuating circumstance—the principal actors in the plot have frankly avowed that their object is to support Slavery, and the slaveholder. The question will soon be presented to the people of Ohio, whether they will unite in such new union, formed for such purposes. To such an alliance, formed for such unholy purposes, I hope Ohio will not yield her assent. The interests and the honor of the free States forbid it: justice and humanity forbid it: respect for the opinions of the civilized world, regard to the principles of our pilgrim fathers, veneration for the memory of our revolutionary ancestors forbid it. The history of past ages, our own experience, proclaim in thunder tones, the infamy and ruin that awaits the damning deed.

J. R. GIDDINGS.

JEFFERSON, August 28, 1845.

P. S.—In answer to Mr. Brown's note, I can only say, that I recollect a conversation with Miss Kelley, concerning the outrages committed upon the free States, in order to sustain Slavery. In that conversation, I expressed my views of the Union, and my wishes in regard to its continuance, with the same qualifications as I have stated them above, and not otherwise. J. R. G.

NEW ENGLAND AND VIRGINIA.

A large number of New England and New-York farmers have, within a few years, gone into Virginia, principally Fairfax county, and purchased the waste land, that is, the land exhausted by bad cultivation. They have gone to work in the New-England style, with "their own hired" help, and are redeeming the soil, and bringing back the means of wealth which Providence placed in the bosom of the earth. The success of this enterprise has been beyond all expectation. The grateful earth responds bountifully to the kindness of the husbandman, and not a drop falls from his brow, that does not promote the fertility of the soil. A correspondent of the Alexandria Gazette, who is a close observer of this inroad upon the manners and customs of the Virginians, has written a series of admirable papers upon the improvements made, and recommends that Virginians shall adopt the mode of life, and encourage the means of labor, which proves to be so eminently successful to their new neighbors. He thus concludes one of his essays:—[Tribune.

"Of late years, we have had frequent appeals to the people of Virginia to imitate the citizens of the Northern States in the improvement of our natural resources, by the construction of railroads and canals, the establishment of manufactures, the improvement of our agriculture, and the extension of our commerce. But are we prepared to adopt the means essential to success? Are we willing to bring up our children to wait upon themselves? Can we substitute hired 'help' for servile dependents? Will we promote the mechanic arts by encouraging our sons to learn them? And shall we be able to discard those prejudices by which honest labor has been depressed, and false notions of gentility engendered amongst us?"

From the Plain Dealer.

Mr. GIDDINGS'S LETTER.

It will be seen by the many and pointed interrogatories of this gentleman to us, that he is desirous of drawing out a general discussion on the subject of Slavery, and more particularly on the question as to how far the Constitution recognizes the "peculiar institution." We have no objection to such a discussion, feeling, as we do, that Mr. G.'s position is wholly untenable, and fearing nothing from the truth which, such a controversy if properly conducted, would necessarily elicit.

We have no time to-day to answer Mr. G.'s inquiries, but on a future occasion will pay our respects to him and his fanatical doctrines.

Mr. GRAY:—I have just read in the "Liberty Herald," an extract from the Plain Dealer, containing your remarks upon my letter to the "Republican and Whig." You observe—"He (Giddings) says Slavery is sustained by encroachments on the Constitution, dictated by the South, and contends that this influence is stronger than the Constitution itself, and shows a disposition to abandon that instrument on this account."

You surely could not have designed to misrepresent me, but had you given my remarks to your readers, I am sure they would have drawn any other conclusion than the one at which you arrived. So far from abandoning the Constitution, I said, in express terms, "I would maintain the Constitution in all its bearings!" I am sworn to do that, and the only objection to our union with the slave States, was that they had caused the Federal Government almost continually to violate that instrument. Will you, and your readers, maintain the Constitution in all its bearings? If so, you must resist all encroachments upon the free States for the support of Slavery. Having stated that I would support the Constitution in all its bearings, I said I would not go beyond that. "I said I would not yield a single right of the free States." Would you? I desire to understand on what point the issue is to be formed. I go as far as the Constitution goes—there I stop. If, Sir, you or any reader of this article, would go further, and violate our political compact by yielding up our own rights in order to purchase a continuance of our union with the slaveholding States, please say so, and we will then understand each other. My motto is, "Give me constitutional Union, or give me dissolution." Would you, or any reader of your paper, adhere to a Union without constitutional restrictions? If so, please express the sentiment, that we may understand the point on which we differ.

But you say, "Mr. Giddings talks of a dissolution of the Union, and hints at the existence of two Republics, a Northern and a Southern, with Constitutions antagonistical, as a practical thing. This we pronounce a dangerous dogma." Why is it a dangerous dogma? There are about nine millions of freemen north of Masons and Dixon's line. Four-fifths of the whole revenue of the nation is paid in the free States, and four-fifths of the physical power of the nation is in the free States. The danger, therefore, cannot be to us. But you say there would be war between the two Republics. But which of the two Republics would declare war against the other?

The slave States have about four millions of free population, and about three millions of slaves. These slaves are so many deadly enemies within the borders of those States. In case of war, it would require the whole military force of those States to keep the slaves in subjection. They would not be in a situation to go to war. They would have neither men nor money to carry on a war with us. As you well recollect, in 1779, South Carolina sent an agent to Congress expressly for the purpose of informing that body that they could furnish no troops against the common enemy, as it required all their men to hold their slaves in subjection. Such would be the helpless condition of the slave States at this time. They would be incapable of making war. If they were to do it, Massachusetts alone would conquer the whole Southern Republic in six months. They could not make war upon us: and I trust we should deal justly by them. If so, I repeat, there would be no danger of war. Nor do I believe there would be one-half the contention between the two sections that exists at this day.

The change may be made. The two Republics may be formed, without even interrupting the employment of the great mass of the people. The great conflict between free labor and slave labor, which has existed since 1775, and which can never be reconciled, would then cease, and prosperity would again animate the Northern laborer. But as in my letter to the "Republican and Whig," I now say I would maintain the Constitution in all its bearings, and leave the slave States to continue or dissolve the Union, as they see fit. But I would have constitutional Union, or dissolution.

Very respectfully, J. R. GIDDINGS.

ANTI-CAPITAL PUNISHMENT MEETING AT THE LYCEUM.

A meeting for the purpose of devising measures to procure the abolition of capital punishment in this and other States, was held last night (20th instant) in the Lyceum of Natural History. The large room was filled with a very influential and intelligent audience, a large number of which were ladies.

The Chair was taken by the President, Vice-Chancellor William T. McCoun, supported by Messrs. John B. Scott and Jacob Harsen, as Vice Presidents, and Mr. Josiah Hopper as Recording Secretary.

The Chairman in a brief and appropriate speech stated the objects of the meeting.

Hon. Roderick N. Morrison then made an able speech against Capital Punishment, introducing extracts from the Report of the Committee of the Legislature of this State, of May 12, 1845, to abolish hanging.

Mr. Balch then introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the firm and settled conviction of this meeting, that the perpetuity of the death penalty is utterly inconsistent with the benevolent spirit of the age, and in direct contravention of the teachings and aims of the Christian religion; and that therefore it is the duty of every friend of humanity to use his utmost endeavors to have this blood-spot wiped out from our statute-books.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, the time has arrived which demands the most vigorous and united effort of the friends of the abolition of Capital Punishment; and that, therefore, the most efficient measures should be forthwith taken to bring the subject before the people of our State in such a way as to enlist their attention and action.

Resolved, That it is important that the subject should be agitated by lectures, discussions, circulation of documents, the collection of facts and statistics bearing on the question—and that, to this end, we earnestly recommend the immediate formation of societies in every city, town or hamlet in the State.

Resolved, That as the death-law can only be abolished by the Legislature, it is of the utmost consequence that petitions, praying that body to take immediate measures for the removal of this foul stain upon our Christian Commonwealth, be circulated among all our citizens, and forwarded by their respective representatives to the Legislature as early in the month of January next as possible; that that body may fully understand the wishes of the people on this great question of life and death.

Resolved, That as the circulation of facts and arguments is essential to the right direction of the public mind on this subject, we recommend the publication, in cheap form, for general distribution, of the able and convincing Report of J. L. O'Sullivan, Esq. and other works advocating the same measure.

Resolved, That as funds are necessary for carrying out the object contemplated in the above resolution, the friends of the cause are urgently requested to forward the Executive Committee such sums as they may wish to appropriate to this purpose, for which there shall be forwarded to their address an equivalent in these documents at cost price.

Resolved, That the above resolutions, accompanied by a circular from the Executive Committee be printed and forwarded to all known active friends of this reform in this State; and that all editors willing to do so, are requested to publish the same in their respective journals.

The Rev. T. B. Thayer, in an able and eloquent speech, advocated the resolutions.

Mr. Balch followed in an earnest appeal to all to get up petitions in every town and village in the State. He also introduced the Report of the Committee appointing delegates to the National Convention at Philadelphia, on the 12th of November next, and presented the following names:

William T. McCoun, Horace Greeley, Benjamin Ellis, Jacob Harsen, M. D. Oliver Johnson, Rev William S. Balch, James G. McAdam, Isaac T. Hopper, Rev. Samuel J. May, William A. Conant, Sydney Howard Gay, Rev. T. B. Thayer, Freeman Hunt, William B. Burbank, F. C. Havemeyer.

Mr. Greeley followed with a few remarks on the necessity of requesting the Legislature to submit the subject to the people.

Mr. ——— then alluded to the two unfortunate men under sentence of death at Delhi, and presented petitions to Governor Wright for a commutation of their sentence, which were numerously signed.

Mr. Balch was appointed Corresponding Secretary in the absence of Mr. O'Sullivan.

Mr. Greeley then stated that Rev. Mr. Stetson and Rev. John Pierpont were expected here this week. He moved that the Executive Committee be instructed to call another meeting on this subject as soon as expedient.

The meeting then adjourned.

FREE SUFFRAGE CONVENTION.

We mentioned last week that such a meeting of the colored people was held in Geneva, on the 8th instant. The following is an abstract of their proceedings:

The following persons were chosen officers of the Convention:

President—AUSTIN STEWART, of Canandaigua.

1st Vice President—H. K. THOMAS, of Buffalo.

2d Vice President—T. E. GRANT, of Oswego.

Secretary—J. W. DUFFIN, of Geneva.

The correspondence which follows, was read, and ordered to be printed, with the minutes.

FARMINGTON, N. Y. Sept. 12, 1845.

DEAR SIR:—The colored citizens of Western New-York, have called a Suffrage Convention, to be held at Geneva, on Wednesday, Oct. 8th, 1845, to adopt measures to secure for them the elective franchise.

Your known love of liberty, and hatred to oppression, have induced the committee to extend to you an invitation to be present at that Convention. And I hope, Sir, you will believe me, when I assure you that your decision in the Virginia controversy, while Governor of this State, together with your advocacy of the right of the colored citizens of this State to the right of suffrage, have secured for you a home in the heart of every colored American.

I am, Sir, with respect,
Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM W. BROWN,
In behalf of Committee.

To Hon. WM. H. SEWARD.

AUBURN, Sept. 22, 1845.

DEAR SIR:—Your letter in behalf of the colored citizens of Western New-York, inviting me to attend a convention of the friends of equal and universal suffrage, at Geneva, has been received.

Absorbing professional engagements oblige me to be content with the part of an observer, rather than an actor in public affairs. Therefore, I cannot promise myself the pleasure of accepting your invitation; but I tender you assurances of my hearty sympathy and co-operation.

The prejudices of white men in our country against your race, so groundless in reason, and nurtured so long, and so ungenerously, have produced just, and at last, intolerable self-punishment.

The free white laborer trembles, at the approach of every session of Congress, lest the planters of the South, voting for slaves, may deprive him of protection against the competition of half-paid and half-starved industry in Europe. The poor man of the North is denied liberty of speech in the House of Representatives, and the liberty of addressing citizens of the South on a common evil, through a free press. The commerce of the country, and all its vast interests of improvement, by railroads and canals, have been hazarded in the danger of a war for Slavery; and finally, that institution has secured a preponderating power in the Senate of the United States, by breaking down its high and glorious prerogative of making treaties with foreign States.

These are the alarms, the injuries, and the dangers which perplex the white men of the North. None of them could have happened if the freed men of the North had enjoyed and exercised their inalienable right of suffrage. Their instinctive sympathies could not have been misled. When the white man reproaches you with your complexion, you may safely tell him that a dark skin never covered a doeface.

I confess, I look impatiently for the restoration of your right of suffrage. I see in its consequences not merely the elevation of a large portion of my fellowmen, to higher social virtues and enjoyments, in our own State, but also an influence which will strengthen public opinion, and direct it to the banishment of human Slavery from the face of the earth.

Be assured, then, that the votes I shall cast for a Convention and a Constitution, which will be harbingers of such results, will be the most cheerful exercise of the elective franchise in my life.

I am, dear Sir, with many thanks for the great kindness expressed in your letter,

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. WM. W. BROWN, Farmington, Ontario Co.

The business committee then reported the following resolutions, which were taken up, discussed separately, and adopted:

Resolved, That the only thing for which a Government and laws are wanted is, for the protection of man in the rights which God has given him.

Resolved, That equality in the use of the elective franchise is the only true basis of a Democratic Government.

Resolved, That the extension of this right to one portion of the citizens of this State, and the withholding it from another, however small, is a shameful denial of the fundamental doctrines of genuine Republicanism.

Resolved, That the disfranchisement of the colored citizens of New-York was altogether uncalled for, and unjust, as forty-five years of equal suffrage fully prove.

Resolved, That the majority, by imposing a property qualification upon colored voters, who are greatly in the minority, while they will not observe the same qualification among themselves, betrays a spirit of despotism and oppression, which we can find only in the most tyrannical and despotic Governments.

Resolved, That it is hypocritical for the people of this State to complain of oppression in foreign lands, while they are tolerating an invidious constitutional distinction in regard to the fundamental principles of the Government, which holds that all men are created equal.

Resolved, That we find no fault with the laws of the land, which welcome the oppressed of other nations (if they are white) to the benefits of our institutions, and which furnish a safe asylum; but we con-plain that we, native-born citizens, are denied the same rights which are so largely and freely extended to foreigners.

Resolved, That the town Boards of the several towns in this State, upon which is devolved, by the statute, the duty of selecting from the tax lists, suitable jurors for the courts of record of the respective counties, in uniformly rejecting persons of color, without regard to their qualifications or moral worth, have added greatly to the oppressions under which the colored people labor, and have thus given a semi-official sanction to the prevalent wicked prejudice against color, and gratuitously multiplied the disabilities of an injured people.

Resolved, That the property qualification required of colored voters, is unreasonable, unjustifiable, and unnecessary; draws one line of cast between blacks and whites, and another between colored men; and virtually says to the freeholders—Property, not intelligence, integrity, and patriotism, is the measure of the man.

Resolved, That we demand the restoration of our rights, at the hands of the people of the State of New-York, who, without any cause, took them from us, and have persisted in the wrong for the last twenty-four years.

Resolved, That to the non-possession of the elective franchise may be traced most of the degradation to which we, as a people, have been subjected, and is the fruitful source of unnumbered and unmitigated civil, literary, and religious wrongs.

Resolved, That in proportion as we are treated with disrespect, contumely, and neglect, in our political, literary, and ecclesiastical relations, from the want of the elective franchise; so would we command respect and influence, in these different relations, by the possession of it.

Resolved, That there is great hope for the politically oppressed, in their own exertions, relying upon the favor of Heaven, and appealing to the just sentiments of those in political power.

Resolved, That we hold the elective franchise as a mighty lever for elevating, in the scale of society, any people, and feel sensible that without it, we are but nominally free, the vital means of our improvement being paralyzed: we do therefore believe it obligatory on us, and do hereby pledge ourselves to each other, to use all just means in our power, by devoting a portion of our time, talent, and substance, to agitate this question, until we obtain a restoration of this inestimable boon.

Resolved, That in case a Convention should be called, it is the duty of every friend of equal suffrage to vote for those delegates, in the Whig or Democratic parties, that are in favor of extending to the colored people of this State, equal suffrage.

The following address was adopted by the Convention, and some arrangements were made for future meetings:

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

FELLOW-CITIZENS of the State of New-York, we appeal to you to restore to us the elective franchise, which you have withheld from us for the last twenty-four years; we honor New-York and her noble institutions, but we cannot honor that spirit which actuates the majority, to take away the rights of the minority. To all her citizens the right of suffrage is valuable in proportion as she is free, but surely there are none who can so ill afford to spare it as ourselves; to deprive us of "equal suffrage," is a denial of the fundamental principles of genuine democracy. By depriving us of our rights you deny "that all men are born free, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights;" when you have taken away an individual's right to vote, you have made the Government a despotism to him; to foreigners the want of the right may be tolerable, because a little time or labor will make it theirs; they look forward to the day when they can enjoy it, and hence they enjoy its benefits, but when a distinct class of the community, already sufficiently the objects of prejudice, are wholly and forever disfranchised and excluded to the remotest posterity, from the possibility of a voice in regard to the laws under which they are to live, it is the same thing as if their abode was transferred to the deserts of Arabia; they have lost their check upon oppression, their wherewith to buy friends, their panoply of manhood—in short, they are thrown upon the mercy of a despotic majority. Like every other despot, this despot, majority, will believe in the mildness of its own sway, but who will the more willingly submit to it for that?

We love our native country, much as it has wronged us, and in the peaceable exercise of our inalienable rights, we will cling to it.

We are citizens; this we believe would never have been denied, had it not been for the subserviency of the people of the free States to Slavery; but as our citizenship has been doubted by some who are not altogether unfriendly to us, we beg leave to submit some proofs which we think you will not hastily set aside.

We were regarded as citizens by those who drew up the Articles of Confederation between the States in 1778; the fourth of the said articles contains contains the following language: "The free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." That we were not excluded under the phrase "paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice," any more than our white countrymen, is plain from the debate that preceded the adoption of the article, for, on the 25th of June, 1778, the delegate from South Carolina moved the following amendment in behalf of their State:

In article 4th, between the words free inhabitants, insert "white." Decided in the negative—ayes, two States—nays, eight—one State divided. Such was the solemn decision of the Revolutionary Congress. On the adoption of the present Constitution of the United States no change was made as to the rights of citizenship. This is explicitly proved by the Journal of Congress. Take for example the following resolution, passed in the House of Representatives, December 21, 1803:

"On motion, resolved, that the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any further provisions are necessary for the effectual protection of American seamen, do inquire into the expediency of granting protection to such American seamen, citizens of the United States, as are free persons of color, and that they report by bill, or otherwise."—Journal House Representatives, 1st session, 28th Congress.

Proofs might be multiplied; in almost every State we have been spoken of, either expressly or by implication, as citizens.

What have we done, fellow-citizens, to forfeit the right of the elective franchise? Why should tax-paying colored men, any more than other tax-payers, be deprived of the right of voting for their representatives?

We ask your attention to facts and testimonies which go to show that, considering the circumstances in which we have been placed, our country has no reason to be ashamed of us. Our fathers shared with yours the trials and perils of the Revolutionary, and the last war; when our common country has been invaded by a foreign foe, colored men have hazarded their lives in its defence, our fathers fought by the side of yours in the struggle which made us an independent nation, we offer the following testimonies:

Hon. Mr. Burgess, of Rhode Island, said on the floor of Congress, January 28th, 1828, that "at the commencement of the Revolutionary war, Rhode Island had a number of this description of people; (slaves,) a regiment were enlisted into the continental service, and no braver men met the enemy in battle; but not one of them was permitted to be a soldier until he had first been made a freeman."

Said the Hon. Charles Miner, of Pennsylvania, in Congress, February 7, 1828: "The African race make excellent soldiers, large numbers of them were with Perry, and aided to gain the brilliant victory on Lake Erie, a whole battalion of them was distinguished for its soldierly appearance."

The Hon. Mr. Clark, in the Convention which revised the Constitution of New-York, in 1821, said in regard to the right of suffrage of colored men: "In the war of the Revolution these people helped to fight your battles by land and by sea. Some of your States were glad to turn out corps of colored men, and to stand shoulder to shoulder with them; in your late war they contributed largely towards some of your most splendid victories, on Lakes Erie and Champlain, where your fleets triumphed over a foe superior in numbers and engines of death; they were manned in a large proportion with men of color; and in this very house, in the fall of 1814, a bill passed, receiving the approbation of all the branches of your Government, authorizing the Governor to accept the services of 2,000 free people of color."

Said the Hon. Mr. Martindale, of New-York, in Congress, January 22, 1828: "Slaves or negroes who had been slaves, were enlisted as soldiers in the war of the Revolution; and I, myself, saw a battalion of them, as fine, martial-looking men as I ever saw attached to the northern army, in the last war, on its march from Plattsburg to Sacketts Harbor."

On the 20th of March, 1779, it was recommended by Congress to the States of Georgia and South Carolina to raise three thousand colored troops who were to be rewarded for their service by their freedom. The delegation from those States informed Congress that such a body of troops would be not only "formidable to the enemy, but would lesson the danger of revolts and desertions" among the slaves themselves.—See secret Journal of the old Congress, volume 1, pages 105—107.

During the last war the free colored people were called to the defence of the country by General Jackson, and received the following testimony to the value of their services:

Soldiers! when on the banks of the Mobile, I called you to take up arms, inviting you to partake the perils and glory of your white fellow-citizens, I expected much from you, for I was not ignorant that you possessed qualities most formidable to an invading enemy; I knew with what fortitude you could endure hunger, and thirst, and all the fatigues of a campaign; I knew well how you loved your native country, and that you had, as well as ourselves, to defend what man holds most dear, his parents, wife, children, and property; you have done more than I expected. In addition to the qualities which I previously knew you to possess; I find moreover, among you a noble enthusiasm, which leads you to the performance of great things.

Soldiers! the President of the United States shall hear how praiseworthy was your conduct in the hour of danger, and the representatives of the American people will, I doubt not, give you the praise which your deeds deserve. Your General anticipates them in applauding your noble ardor, &c. By order, (signed)
THOMAS BUTLER, Aid-de-Camp.

Are we to be thus looked to, for assistance in the "hour of danger," but trampled under foot in the time of peace? Did our fathers fight for American liberty that their children might be disfranchised and loaded with insults? Can the people of New-York justify themselves in wrenching from us the birth-right, civil liberty. We would respectfully ask you to look at the fact, that, while you deprive the colored American citizens, of the benefit of the elective franchise, you at the same time extend it to the foreigner, who may land upon our shores ignorant of our constitution and laws.

We lay hold of the principles which New-York asserted in the hour which tried men's souls, and which they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to sustain. We take our stand upon that solemn declaration, that to protect inalienable rights, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," and proclaim that a government which tears away from us and our posterity the very power of consent, is a tyrannical usurpation which we will never cease to oppose.

ADDRESS

Of the Yearly Meeting of Anti-Slavery Friends held at Newport, from the first to the sixth of the ninth Month, inclusive. To Friends generally. To the members of the religious Society of Friends wherever these may come:

DEAR FRIENDS:—Being permitted through the goodness and mercy of God, to meet together in this our annual assembly, our minds have been turned in much brotherly feeling towards you, and under, we trust, a flow of that gospel love which knows no bounds, we have felt our hearts engaged to address you as brethren and sisters of the same household of faith.

We are aware that the present ruling influence in the different Yearly Meetings of the Society, has, from some cause or other, prevented that interchange of sentiment and reciprocity of Christian feeling between us and those bodies, which it seems to us the cause of truth demands of those making profession of the same Christian doctrines and principles, and of supporting the same vital and precious testimonies: yet we doubt not but there are many of you whose hearts will respond to this our salutation of Christian affection and love.

In proportion as the advancement of the cause of our holy Redeemer is appreciated, we apprehend will be estimated the privilege of speaking one to another for mutual help and encouragement, and of thus stirring up in each other, the pure mind by way of remembrance.

Entertaining these sentiments, we feel engaged to call your attention to subjects which we deem of the greatest importance to the advancement of that cause which we, as professors of the Christian name, have espoused. The first to which we would allude, is that of the existence of Slavery throughout the world, and especially in professedly Christian communities. We are aware that you, as well as we, have long held a testimony against this crying sin, but what, dear Friends, has been the amount of exertions which we have in time past put forth for its extirpation? Has our testimony been an efficient one? Have we not been in the practice of that which is calculated to neutralize it, and merely refraining from any direct participation therein ourselves, quietly folded our arms in apathy, and suffered our neighbors, without rebuke, to continue the practice?

We apprehend a true response to these interrogatories would disclose an awful culpability, unless a want of thought and reflection upon the tendency of our action, or non-action, can exonerate us. We know that there have been honorable exceptions, but the main body of Friends, while lamenting the cruelties inflicted on the slave, have at least indirectly paid the master for the extorted fruit of that toil which had been performed under the infliction of the lash,—they have rendered the ungodly oppressor honorable, so far as the weight of their character—their elective franchise, and political influence could effect that object.

We apprehend these remarks are more or less applicable to Friends throughout the world; but it is to those in the United States that we would wish more particularly to refer. We do not make these remarks in a fault-finding disposition, for well do we know that we ourselves have been verily guilty concerning our brother, in time past, but suffer us to say, in the language of the Apostle James, when exhibiting the inconsistencies of those he was addressing, on another subject: "Brethren, these things ought not so to be." Let us for our own encouragement, call to mind the firmness, energy, and uncompromising zeal of our worthy predecessors, in their active and aggressive opposition to every thing, both in Church and State, which they believed to be wrong. Were the laws under which they suffered, anything to compare, in regard to cruelty, with many of the laws in the Southern States of this Confederacy, under which our colored brethren continually groan? and yet their opposition was such, that they in most, if not every instance, withheld all support from those enactments, consistent with their peaceable principles. But how has it been in the present day? Friends have, by their political course, performed a large share in enacting those more cruel and oppressive laws, instead of refusing to comply with such regulations, and peaceably and faithfully suffering the penalty. These remarks particularly apply to Friends in the slave States, but notwithstanding this has been their course, still they have professed to bear a firm and unflinching testimony against Slavery; and what would seem a more remarkable circumstance, many of them, having bequeathed to the slaves, so far as their own actions were concerned, the laws under which they groan, to avoid the direful consequences naturally arising from such a legacy, have left the country, and removed to free States; thus leaving the victims of such enactments to pine in chains, and drag out a miserable existence in the absence of those, who, had they remained, might at least have performed the part of the good Samaritan, in pouring in the oil and the wine.

But have they not, like the Priest and the Levite, passed by on the other side? Nay, have they not been more culpable? The Priest and the Levite had no hand in placing the man among thieves, but these doubtless have been active agents in reducing the slaves to their present condition. There surely is a very heavy responsibility resting upon Friends residing in the slave States. The Church of Christ must, and will be as the salt of the earth,—the light of the world, and as a city set on a hill that cannot be hid. Let your light so shine, dear friends, in regard to this vitally important subject, that others seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in Heaven.

The slaves, your and our brethren, are in chains in your land, and they are thus conditioned, at least in part, through your instrumentality, and that of your ancestors, and it is works in their favor, and not mere words that are required at your hands. Where will be your preserving influence, as the salt of the earth, if you do not practically oppose those unjust and cruel enactments, let the consequence be what it may? Where will be your light, as a city set on a hill, if you desert your brethren in bonds, for the sake of ease or convenience, if you withdraw your light on the subject, from the public mind, and leave it to grope in its present awfully dark and depraved condition? We are sensible in some degree of the trials to which you must be subjected in the support of a firm, unflinching, and aggressive testimony against this crying sin, and we desire, if possible, to strengthen your hands therein.

There is an awful and portentous cloud hanging over our country, and we are warranted in believing, that should it escape the threatened vengeance of Heaven, it will be through the condescending mercy and goodness of God, in consequence of the prayers, the intercessions, and renovating influence of the example and efforts of the few righteous that dwell therein, even as the presence of ten such would have saved the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah formerly.

It is indeed a painful reflection, that Slavery, war, and intemperance should be, as at present, upheld by many of the professors of the religion of Jesus—that an appeal should be made to the Bible for a justification of such practices. No wonder that Infidelity is making such fearful inroads among the people, as is at present witnessed. For, let it once be understood that the religion of the Bible sanctions practices thus notoriously inhuman and revolting, the ingenuous mind must at once reject it with feelings of disgust. Hence, dear friends of every country and description, as the cause of our holy Redeemer is near to our hearts, as we desire the extension and establishment of His kingdom on earth, let us labor with earnestness and zeal, and put forth every effort in our power, for the removal of these foul blots from the Christian name; omitting no opportunity of reproving and exhorting, in Christian meekness and love, all who are engaged in such practices.

But above every other consideration let us be careful that while we are reproving others for wrong doing, we do not virtually support and uphold the same evils by our own actions, and thus unhappily condemn ourselves in the things which we allow.

There is yet another subject to which we wish to call your attention, and which we would venture to suggest has not claimed that consideration of Friends, which its importance demands. It is that of capital punishment; or the legal taking of life, for the commission of crime. This practice, so universal throughout all civilized, and professedly Christian communities, is most certainly contrary to the precepts of the Gospel. It was not Christ's mission, according to his own declaration, to destroy men's lives, but to save them; and if it is contrary to the spirit of Christ, to take life upon any occasion, how can it be possible that his followers can do it with impunity? To us it appears no better than a system of legalized murder; and we know no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. We could therefore, sincerely desire that Friends everywhere might be very careful, not to give countenance to such a practice, by attending places of public execution, or voting for men as Legislators, who favor such a revolting and inhuman practice.—Finally, in conclusion, dear friends, may the God of Peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the Sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory forever and ever, Amen.

TO POLISH MAHOGANY FURNITURE.—Rub it with cold linseed oil, and polish by rubbing with a clean dry cloth after wiping the oil from the furniture. Do this once a week, and your mahogany tables will be so finely polished that hot water will not injure them. The reason is this: linseed oil hardens when exposed to the air, and when it has filled all the pores of the wood, the surface becomes hard and smooth like glass.

Communications.

Letter from Ireland.

DUBLIN, Sept. 30th, 1845.

FRIEND GAY:—I could not let the boat leave without sending you a few lines, to inform you of our labors and progress. We have been here in the city of Dublin one month, which is much longer than we expected to stop when we first arrived. The reason of our long stay is owing to the increased interest in the cause of emancipation in our country, occasioned by the lectures which Frederick has given.

It has been extremely difficult to move the people out, and it was some time before they came; but now the interest is very great. The people are like Lehigh coal, hard to ignite, but make a very hot fire when they are once under way. They are free, and generous, and are ready to do all they can, when they are well informed as to their duty. Great ignorance prevails among the great body of the people, as to the true position of our country, on the question of Slavery, the Anti-Slavery cause, our Constitution, and other obstacles which retard the progress of abolition. I think some light has been shed on the subject, and considerable interest created. Many of the first citizens of Dublin have attended our meetings, and given their countenance and support to help on the cause; among whom, none has rendered more prompt and efficient service, than the Lord Mayor of the City, who kindly consented to preside at our meeting on Tuesday evening last. He made a short speech, in which he said, that his mind had been called to the horrors of Slavery in the United States, by reading an account of the raising of some shackles from one of our Government vessels, (the Missouri,) on the coast of Calcutta, intended for the Slave-Trade, and he had been much enlightened by what he had heard that night, and should feel it his duty, in future, to bear a more decided and open testimony against American Slavery.

I have attended a great Repeal meeting in Conciliation Hall. When I arrived, although it was before the time appointed, the hall was crowded. I was introduced to the Liberator, and invited to take a seat with him on the platform. This gave me a fine opportunity to see and hear him to the best advantage. I had the greatest desire to hear the man, whom the world has acknowledged to be one of the greatest of the age. I will not attempt a minute description of the man, well knowing, that no pen of mine can do him justice. I have heard great men on our side the water. I have listened to the iron logic of a Webster, the smooth and classic speeches of a Choate, and the silver-strains, and beautiful periods of our own Phillips; but I must say, that for burning and withering denunciation of oppressors, and the fine and finished construction of his sentences, the rich tones of voice, and powerful gesture, I have never seen any man on our side the waters that exceeds him. He has been stopping at his farm in the country for some time, to recruit his health, preparatory to a series of monster meetings, which he has now commenced for the Fall. He is in fine spirits, and, although now about seventy years of age, he looks as fresh and vigorous, as though he was no more than forty. He expects to live many years to come. He says his family have a trick of living until they are ninety. I would rather see him than any other man in the kingdom. I send you a paper containing his speech. I think the women-whippers in our country must feel their degradation, when they find themselves held up to enlightened audiences throughout the civilised world.

Since we have been in this country, we have experienced the most marked respect by individuals of the first respectability, who would scorn from their presence the most aristocratic slaveholder, or his wicked apologist. You can have no just conception of the loathing which the people have of the hypocrisy of our Government. While we are boasting of our religious and political freedom, we are holding one out of every six of our population, in the worst of bondage—while we are proclaiming that the press, and the pulpit are free, and untrammeled, we are silencing every attempt to plead the cause of the oppressed, by the pistol, and bowie-knife.

Our hearts were made sad by the news of the suppression of C. M. Clay's paper. Oh! what a chivalrous set are those Kentuckians! what brave men to attack a man's property when he is sick, and confined to his bed. What a sublime position they now occupy before the world! coming together in regularly organized mobs, and then declaring that Mr. Clay had done nothing but what he had a perfect right to do, by the laws, and Constitution; and yet they send a Committee to steal his property in a genteel style, by the hands of sixty gentleman-ruffians.

I am ashamed to own here, that I come from such a country, without telling the people that I am an Abolitionist. I dare not open my mouth against the many evils of the Government here, or say a word in favor of the many good principles in our own, lest I should be rebuked by the reply: "Oh! you come from the land of slaveholders, where children are sold by the pound, and women to suit purchasers." These things have rendered us despicable even in the eyes of despots, for no Government this side of the water, is mean enough to be guilty of the things practised in our own.

I have written thus far in great haste, but must stop in order to get my letters into the mail, which will close very soon. I will write you again, when I hope I shall be able to give you a more interesting letter.

Yours, for the right,
JAMES N. BUFFUM.

The Anti-Slavery Standard.

NEW-YORK, THURSDAY, OCT. 30, 1845.

Anti-Texan and Anti-Slavery action in Massachusetts.

The adjourned Middlesex Mass-Meeting at Cambridge.

All the leading men of the county who were present at the two previous meetings, were again on the spot, with the purpose of setting in motion the means of condensing the public sentiment of the State in such a shape as shall overpower all partisan lines of division, and, freed from the delusive spell of political gradualism, shall tell immediately upon Congress, and compel that body of Whiggism and Democracy to feel the people master and itself a servant.

The Hon. Henry Wilson took the chair, and William Schouler, Esq. of Lowell, the Secretary's desk.

A business committee, consisting of Messrs. Thomas S. Harlow, Hon. William Jackson, Messrs. Brown, of Lowell, Walcott, of Natick, and Farnsworth, of Groton, having been appointed, retired for the preparation of business.

Mr. GARRISON presented a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That should the perfidious and unlawful act of Texan annexation be consummated at the next session of Congress, it will be the duty of the Legislature of Massachusetts promptly to declare in the name of the people, such act null and void,—one that never can receive their sanction, be the consequences what they may.

The Committee retired for the preparation of business,—the Chairman, Mr. T. S. Harlow, stating as they did so, that they considered the ground of principle covered by the resolutions of the previous meeting, and should therefore merely present those covering the ground of action contemplated. It had been their purpose to prepare also a resolution similar to the one just offered by Mr. Garrison, but since it was already before the meeting, and would occupy the time in their absence, they should consider that as a sufficient basis for the discussion of provisional action in the last event.

Previous to the appointment of the business committee, Thomas S. Harlow, Esq. of Medford, spoke as follows:

The question, before the country, Mr. Chairman, is no longer whether the black race shall be emancipated, but whether the white race shall be enslaved. Southern policy is founded entirely on Slavery. It is not in one thing only, nor in one event only that this is made evident. I look upon the contemplated annexation of this great slaveholding territory as one in a succession of events all tending inevitably towards the same conclusion. If these encroachments upon Northern rights go on, all is lost. The catastrophe may yet be averted by a great Northern party which should not submit to be carried headlong by mere political leaders. If the spirit of Liberty is not dead, this is the course affairs will take. Time was, when all minor considerations gave way before the great question of Freedom. It was not dollars and cents, and cotton and sugar alone, that occupied men's souls; and I hope we shall find virtue enough in Massachusetts, in our time, to defy dollars and cents, and sugar and cotton, and cotton manufactures too. Something remains to be done by us, though the case has been assumed by political leaders to be desperate. The course of the South should be an example to us in our mode of procedure. They always go together as one man, for the support of their system, and it should now be our business to devise and pursue such a line of conduct to sustain ours, as that every man of right feeling and principle in the Whig and Democratic parties, shall feel the compulsion of his conscience upon him to pursue in this emergency. I will leave it to be developed by others, during the day, only stating that we are, in my apprehension, here, not to discuss the subject of Slavery mainly, but incidentally, as connected with the subject of Annexation. We are not here as Anti-Slavery men, but as freemen of the North.

After Mr. Harlow retired with the Business Committee, the Rev. CALEB STETSON, of Medford, spoke as follows:—

We have, Mr. President, a great many good words floating about in the community;—enough to make men think of what befel a crew wrecked once before, in northern latitudes. Six months after, when the chains of frost began to yield, there was a wonderful echoing, and voices were heard that could not overcome the coldness, when they first attempted to get a hearing. In this case, Sir, we find in like manner, that after long torpor the air seems unexpectedly full of words; and I hope they will all get thawed out before the great conflagration, and go sounding on, till they shall have awakened the whole people. Let them go forth, not to Whigs and Democrats, not to Liberty partisans, but to righteous men, till all shall become righteous through the righteous remonstrance. And it shall be so, fellow-citizens, if this "breath of the sweet South," has not scorched up the dews of humanity, which water men's hearts from heaven.

There was a Welch captain I once read of, who had seen one PISTOL—ancient PISTOL—uttering such brave words at the bridge, that he thought on his conscience, that this ancient Pistol must be as valiant as Mark Anthony.

I remember those "words at the bridge," last winter—I was there—at the bridge of Faneuil; and so were you too, Mr. Chairman, and we did think to see gallant service done in consequence. I thought it was meant to make ourselves masters of the bridge, and maintain the mastership too; and shall it not be done yet, friends? I thought we there meant to waken the spirit of our old Commonwealth, and by her, the whole country, and I trust we here mean it still. We mean to shed no man's blood—to blow out no man's brains, after the old war-like fashion. We have better weapons than they had in the old times. We want the blood—the brain of every man to be those weapons. Let us magnetize them to the utmost: they are the instruments with which the warfare of humanity is to be carried on. There is not a man—there is not a woman—in New England, but has some circle where each can act with greater effect than any other person, and each is thus a missionary appointed by Providence to speed the redemption of the land. There are multitudes of such missionaries, as we know, Sir.—The spirit of Faneuil Hall is not dead, but sleepeth. If it were not so, that it is asleep for the moment, this Hall would not—yonder Common would not be large enough to contain us. But we are not overwhelmed by numbers, because the people have not been awakened, and informed that the danger is imminent. When some spoke last winter, before the Faneuil Hall meeting, of the necessity of immediate action, they were told "the time had not arrived;—there was no danger;—it was too early to act." After the Faneuil Hall meeting they said, the thing is done;—why shut the stable-door after the steed is stolen? it is too late. It is always too early, or too late with such people—too high, or too low. Like the man undergoing the cat-o'-nine-tails, you never can hit them right.

Now, as to our means, Mr. Chairman. There is no need of such, as are ordinarily put in use. They are unsuited to the work. We shall go on, I hope, on common grounds, without party organization, party candidates, or party nominations, gathering up the whole public feeling of the State, so that the very next Congress shall be instructed by it. Let this be done, without party machinery, or party feelings, and it will be impossible for the Congress of the United States to admit Texas as a slave State. (Applause.) That is the one purpose in crowding onward the catastrophe—the extension of Slavery—so says one of the organs of the Democratic majority, that helped to hasten it—the Democratic Review. It was the avowed object, to extend the area of freedom. The writer says it was a blunder, (worse, as Fouché said, than a crime,) to put it on that foundation. Here, we as openly take our stand. It shall not be admitted because it is a slave State! (Applause.) But Government means to go and commit us in this matter, and we are to become part and parcel of a slaveholding nation.

Shall we bear this! Some say, it is done; and we must. I say, NO!—(applause,) it is not done!—and if it were, it might be undone. Righteousness enough, is all that is wanting to prevent, or undo it! I will meet all questioners, as to admission of Texas, as a slaveholding State, with a NO! And it shall be in the words (not the sense) of Carlyle—AN EVERLASTING NO! It shall have all the might of affirmation! (enthusiastic applause.)

If we are overcome in this contest, it can be only because of pecuniary influences, and political temptations, which paralyze every free tongue. But carry into every parish, every town, every county of this State, a spirit which shall loose men's tongues—get a strong expression of State opinion and feeling, of FREE opinion and feeling, and Texas cannot be annexed.

But grant it be; will this work have been done in vain? No, I say! No good effort can fail so long as a righteous God lives. It may not work out what we look for, but every righteous word men speak, and every righteous deed, shall go sounding through the universe, to fulfil yet grander and more benevolent purposes than yours and mine, in the counsels of infinite Providence.

What if our immediate purpose fail? our life of protest and labor for the right cannot fail. It shall raise up a generation of brave and faithful hearts, to carry on our work in the coming age. Its effect shall not be limited by space, any more than it shall be checked by time. Will ideas stop at geographical boundaries! Will the flood of feeling roll back at Mason and Dixon's line! Will thought regard the slave-laws! No! it will go sounding on, till it accomplishes whereunto it was sent.

But can you hope, by the introduction of a foreign State, to make us all slaveholders? We declare it is impossible. We will sever that cord by which you hope to bind us. What has been done by joint resolution, shall be undone by joint resolution, or we will cut that Gordian knot of slaveholding policy which we cannot untie.

Our resolve is unchangeable: not so that of the advocates of Texan annexation. As they have changed once, so basely, under the pressure of circumstances, so they may again; for we mean what we say when we declare, (I quote the very words of the party now in power,) that "under no circumstances whatever, will we consent to the annexation of the slaveholding territory of Texas." (Applause.)

Mr. Stetson was followed by Mr. Lovejoy, of Cambridgeport, who expressed the feeling that it was too late. There were but two courses for Massachusetts—one to withdraw from the Union, and to stand alone, folded in the mantle of her past deeds; and the other to die in arms, like Sparta. If there were any other way, he should like to know it. What did the gentleman who offered the resolution, contemplate? If others were prepared for the course the resolution seemed to indicate, he, (Mr. Lovejoy,) should be ready. But he did not believe Massachusetts was prepared. The change in the last eighteen months indicated that she was less than ever ready for such a course. Then only a solitary press was in favor of Annexation. Now all advocate it without a mask. "My people love to have it so." Where is the volume of that voice which is to be concentrated in the ear of the nation?

We have but one alternative—to drive down our stake into the firm rock, and rally round it what we may, or to retire into the cleft of the rock, uttering a simple protest, and letting the matter go. There were floating words enough, as had been previously observed, but there was no great echo, that he was able to observe.

Mr. Garrison followed, in response to Mr. Lovejoy's inquiry. He was not there for the purpose of influencing that meeting, but to learn the spirit of Middlesex. The friend who had just spoken, knows me, and that my words are not wind.

In this resolution, I have only said what the Bay State ought to do in case of Annexation—what her Legislature have already said in 1838—what Vermont, in her Legislature, has also affirmed,—what Adams, Slade, Giddings, and a host of other distinguished men, asserted in 1843. Annexation is dissolution, if all this (Mr. Garrison read at length from the documents and resolutions) be true. The question now is, as we are about to see the deed consummated, will the people of Massachusetts hold to this? Will the Whigs, will the Democrats, will the Liberty party [emphatically] of Massachusetts hold to it. Everywhere there is defection, and men's hearts failing them for fear. The gentleman asks what I would have Massachusetts do? I'll tell him what she ought to do, with her principles. She's a patriotic State; and I am no patriot. She says this is an act which shall not be submitted to. Well, she must declare she does not submit:—and that's revolution;—and if I were a fighting man, I would say, fight it out!—fight it to the last! If they who have fought for so many things of comparative insignificance, will not fight now, I would they might be scourged and branded; I would that they might be whipt like slaves, as they are; it might beget some spirit in them.

I, as a peace man, have a process of my own. I would submit, but never sanction or acquiesce. But I have not come to give my plans. I came to hear the voice of Middlesex: not that I would have any geographical or political limitations of human sympathy, but because there is a time and place for everything, and this is the time and place to listen to the voice of the spirit of the hour, and of the spot.

I heard a voice saying, as I entered, that this was a question of the enslavement of the whites—not of the blacks. We shall find, on examining into causes, that the Slavery of the blacks is the question, after all. We have, as a nation, bound a chain upon their limbs. Therefore, it is that we find the other end of it attaching to our own.

WM. A. WHITE, Esq. of Watertown, Middlesex County, followed Mr. Garrison, in a speech of great warmth and animation, which met a hearty response, especially when he said, in allusion to the remarks of Mr. Lovejoy: "Let us go on, Sir, rallying the country around us as we go, and, like those Spartans, who passed the night of their resolve to sacrifice themselves for their country, in prayer and song, and then went forth with the morning, joyfully, though they knew it was to die, let us gladly devote ourselves for the redemption of our country."

Then, in consequence of some desponding remarks of a previous speaker, Mr. White alluded very feelingly to the strong spirit of hope in the women of Massachusetts. It had cheered him in the darkest hours, and the men would do well to act as hopefully. He also spoke of the duty of resisting and overcoming the spirit of hesitation, and doubt, and opposition. He knew this last spirit was strong, even in this county, Not many miles from Cambridge, it was so strong as to turn the worthiest and most deserving clergymen away from their parishes:—he knew the first spirit was so strong that it made men, from whom much had been expected, stand like the two boys of the story, who, all the preliminaries arranged, did not come to blows, because "one was afraid, and the other durst not." It needed but men to go ahead, and pioneer the way for them, and they would be found in the right spot, if for no other reason, because they could not help it. Those who go ahead, will be called Nullifiers; he accepted the term, if it meant to refuse to sustain that mockery of a Government which was striving to annex Texas. He thought something of good Government, and if he were to be a fighting man, he must, in consistency, take arms in its defence, and against this existing form of it, all bloated up with iniquities. He then drew a graphic picture of a military review, and all its fantastic trickery, and ridiculed the absurdity of men who trained themselves for fight, and when the time came for fighting in a noble cause, had no heart for it. He was for taking strong action to-day—not only against Texas, but ulterior action, embracing the whole scope of the question. He felt faith and hope growing stronger in his bosom—we should make this the Rubicon, and the next and the next meeting would be more powerful still: we should ere long have a response from Maryland and Kentucky. He hoped there would be no party organization—this whole matter lay deeper than party could reach. We must not foolishly attempt to stop the mere volcanic eruption at the crater. We must go deep down to the infernal central fires of a corrupt public sentiment.

We regret to be prevented by want of room and time, from giving Mr. White's exact words, but the above is a brief sketch of the tenor of his remarks, which were suspended on the entrance of Mr. Thomas S. Harlow, from the Business Committee, with a plan of immediate action.

Mr. Bradburn, then made a very amusing but not very reformatory speech, setting forth "the impracticability of doing anything when ninety-nine one hundredths of the community were opposed;" and that in such a case, it was not worth while to offer a proposition. In one hundred—one thousand—one hundred thousand instances, our rights had been more greatly outraged than by the annexation of Texas. We had no rights left.

Mr. Bradburn instanced in particular the treatment of our colored mariners at the South, which our readers will recollect came particularly under his cognizance as one of the legislators of Massachusetts, and on which he is, from that knowledge, peculiarly qualified to speak.

The Rev. Barzillai Frost, of Middlesex county, spoke ably upon the importance of a common ground, and the preservation of individual freedom; of keeping to the point, and not launching out into generalities. He did not think it worth while to attempt the impracticable, but the plan of the Committee for condensing and directing public sentiment against Annexation, was not in his view, impracticable; and that was the point of the meeting.

Mr. Harlow, of Middlesex county, moved that all citizens present agreeing with us, be invited to participate in the discussions.

Rev. CALEB STETSON, of Middlesex county, hoped that we should not exclude any who might be present of opposite views.

E. R. HOAR, Esq. of Middlesex county, had no objection to any arrangement, provided it did not interfere with our purpose—the bringing of Middlesex county to act upon the Commonwealth, and through her on the country.

Mr. E. WRIGHT, thought all present were sufficiently agreed in opinion to be able to act advantageously together.

W. A. WHITE, Esq. of Middlesex county, proposed that it be a general discussion and a county vote.

WILLIAM SCHOULER, Esq. of Middlesex county, did not believe that there were a hundred persons in the county who were in favor of Annexation, if the question could be fairly put to them, independently of other questions, and he was for having that done by rational action, the plan of which should be set forth in detail by resolutions bearing upon their face the exact truth as to our purposes, and nothing more. He did not wish to bring in any Southerners or opposers to intermeddle and frustrate them. This preliminary question is, whether we shall annex all creation to this meeting. I say no, for the sake of speedy and effectual action. If all men from the free States discuss with us, and the vote be made up of Middlesex men, that will meet my views.

Mr. BRADBURN, said something which the reporter did not hear.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, said this was a meeting of men who had rights, and were determined to maintain them.

Mr. GARRISON, presumed that no person present from beyond the limits of the county, had the slightest idea of voting. He advocated Mr. Schouler's proposition.

The President pro tem, Hon. Henry Wilson, put the question, and it was so decided.

Mr. T. S. HARLOW read the resolutions embodying a plan for immediate county action upon the State; and remarked that the county gentlemen knew and believed, that there was right sentiment enough in the county, so far as this plan went, to carry it triumphantly, if that sentiment could but be disconnected from party trammels and ties. We would enlarge our committees of correspondence—call meetings in every parish, every town, every county;—thus prepared, we would all, throughout the State, unite in an overwhelming State Convention, planting ourselves in Faneuil Hall, and it would be found that the voice of Massachusetts was not dead, merely because there had been no powder burnt or blood spilt, since the Faneuil Hall Convention. We are said to be a cold people: it may be so—but once warmed, we are not easily chilled again. Once aroused, we are not readily put to sleep again. Our warmth and energy will be felt beyond the State. Our voice will rally A GREAT FREEMAN'S PARTY of the North, from which the Southern men who will, shall not be excluded. (Applause.) We will sustain no party or course which does not repel Texas. Let all public men understand this, and we shall not find them eating their own words. The resolutions I have presented point out the way of concentrating this spirit, which we know does not sleep. Other ways may be suggested and discussed, but we of Middlesex county do not contemplate dissolution of the Union in this movement.

Mr. Harlow then spoke of the wrongs, we alone of all people, undergo from the South. What English sailor was ever taken from an English vessel, and thrown into jail in Southern ports? How long, in such a case, would it have been, before a declaration of war followed? Endurance had ceased to be a virtue, but we would endure one more hour for the sake of the present effort.

We regret to be obliged to abridge, and omit so much that would be desirable to have preserved in the fore going.

Mr. Lovejoy, of Middlesex county, would move the acceptance of the plans of the Business Committee, for this reason, that they were practicable. We lose the confidence of practical men, if we adopt those which are not so. The other resolution was like an unknown quantity in mathematics. The first thing done should be to throw it out in solving our practical problem. We might be defeated—we need not stay defeated. We should emulate old Blucher, who was beaten, but never conquered; however often beaten, he always rallied next day. Like him, we should find a Waterloo somewhere, for the advocates of Slavery, and we would never quit the field till we had found it.

Mr. Lovejoy spoke ably, and at length; but we have been obliged to abridge, so as to do justice only to the idea.

Hon. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, of Boston, rose, and said that he was somewhat peculiarly circumstanced in this Convention, representing, as he did, through the kindness of his constituents, those who had expressed in the Legislature, the opposition of Massachusetts to Annexation, and, who had been severely reflected on in the course of these discussions. Gentlemen present, have not in his estimation, the right to indulge in these reflections. The Legislature had supposed, in the past action of that body against Texan Annexation, that it represented the people of Massachusetts. It had relied on them. It had been disappointed in them. "We fought," continued Mr. Adams, "the battle last year, and lost it; and I will not say why we lost it. But I will say your situation is owing to your own party divisions, and I will add, that unless you can agree to act together, you will be defeated always in like manner. Look at Massachusetts! divided into, I know not how many parties, and then look at the South united in all that concerns Slavery, as the heart of one. My friend's resolution, (alluding to the one offered by Mr. Garrison,) will not unite us all, and, therefore, I am not for making it the basis of this day's action. But union is the indispensable requisite for any effectual action.

It does not become us, Sir, to speak in very strong terms in view of the divided condition of our State. We should lower our tone if we would have a correspondence between our language, and the reality of the case. How shall we be able to meet it, if we allow every little question to take the precedence of the great one of Slavery, and Anti-Slavery, now before the nation? We should have a feeling of the relative importance of things; and it is my misfortune to see that this State has not yet got to that feeling.

Such, and such men, I hear gentlemen say, have done so, and so: Well! would they have done so, had public sentiment sustained them in the course of opposition to Southern encroachment, with which they commenced?

It becomes you to look forward, Sir, in this emergency. It might not be impossible, that you might call your proposed Convention in Faneuil Hall, while a Governor and Legislature, should be co-operating with the South for Annexation, from the State-House. I repeat, Sir, that you have got to begin on a very low tone; separating your action entirely from political partisanship, and resting it wholly on the strong moral ground. This is what is more than anything necessary; and if we can prevail on our people to view it so, and to act in consistency with that view, then, Sir, the case is settled rightly; but if not, it will certainly go against us."

Mr. GARRISON, adverting to Mr. Adams's remark on the resolution he had presented, said:—"Sir, this resolution does but speak of Legislative duty; it does but say what Massachusetts OUGHT to do; and will my friend object to its passage here, who has so eloquently advocated its adoption in the Legislature ere now? Will he shrink from a fresh advocacy of it here, or anywhere, because the people will not sustain it? What if they will not? Have we not an individual duty to perform, each one of us here? and surely, so had the members of our Legislature, in the years that have just passed."

Mr. E. WRIGHT, said that he was one of those, who could not trust the party leaders of the last years. That was his motive for doing as he had done.

Hon. CHARLES F. ADAMS, disclaimed any impeachment of gentlemen's motives for the course he had disapproved.

Mr. Wright, was quite ready to forgive the gentleman, and hoped the gentleman was equally ready to forgive him, they might go on together on the lower tone. Mr. Wright thought the question of Annexation had never been fairly presented to the Democratic mind of the country. It had been made acceptable to their Anglo-Saxon prejudices, that Texas should be annexed, by representing it as extending the area of freedom, and they were befooled by this false issue. But on the naked question, divested of its mask, the response would be different. The people have a right to say, that Texas shall not come with its rascality upon it, and have you so little faith in man, as to believe that the Democrats will not be true to their Democratic principles, on the naked question? A plan had been adopted by the Liberty party, which was feasible, and there were a sufficient number here to start the machinery. It was, to have some man at the polls on election day, to take the names of every voter opposed to Annexation, and the women could get the names of their own sex. This was the idea started at the recent Liberty party Convention, and it had received a favorable response. Mr. Wright then read a letter from Woonsocket, enclosing money to carry on the plan.

Mr. Wright closed, by saying that as far as this effort was concerned, he knew that Liberty party was willing to be merged; and this was what he called a practical view of the case. We give Mr. Wright's idea, in our own words though.

Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS agreed in thinking so too, and hoped that a committee would be appointed, to use the time between now and the next session of Congress, in building up a public sentiment against Texas, though he should also advocate the course proposed by Mr. Garrison's resolution, as indicating the right course for Massachusetts to take. If our fathers, in their day, had done it, we had not have stood thus humbled to-day before the slave power. We should do it in ours, for this reason:—that we may preserve our own souls: The Whigs and the Democrats should do it, even for the preservation of all they value. As long as men lie in the lap of Delilah, they may be sure they will have their locks shorn. What cares the South for all you can do while under her sceptre? Till a body of men deny its authority—till this body says COME OUT, there is very little hope; therefore it is, I say, COME OUT!—that you may save your integrity alive: COME OUT—that your own virtue may not be a matter of history six months hence.

I hear one and another asking about results, but I say, Sir, nothing can result for the cause of Freedom, unless men refuse to be counted in the ranks of Slavery.

I know the high feelings of our Adams's, and our Allens, and many others, and I honor them—but I dare affirm of any men, that unless their feelings are strong enough to override all party divisions for their country's salvation, themselves will add fresh names to the list of those who have yielded to political temptations.

It has been called impracticable to obtain action of sufficient strength to check the onward steps of Texan annexation. I grant we cannot do it alone. I agree that five men out of six are dead to the claims of the moment—the Democrats, because they are gaining power, the Whigs, because they are making money.

I heard it asserted that five-sixths of the community, nay, ninety-nine hundredths were against us. I know it—there is hardly one in a hundred ready to break his party ties, or abandon his sectarian organizations. But I know what might make them—the presentation of men to lead them on, whose names are untainted with Anti-Slavery, and unassociated with the odium that inevitably gathers round the name of him who has labored for the down-trodden for a long course of years.

If we can do this—if we can place on this committee names that are broadly known through the land—idolized, and loved, it may be of some effect:—Otherwise, the effort will be but a waste of time.

The hour of adjournment is now at hand, and I hope the interval between this time and the afternoon meeting, will be used practically, in drafting into this service, gentlemen's names that shall give a fresh infusion of that power of character which the people at large know how to estimate—names yet unhackneyed in the advocacy of the Anti-Slavery cause; otherwise it is of no use. I sympathize with those whose names are most intimately associated with the Anti-Slavery cause—but the people don't. Find such names as I just indicated, and go forward.

Mr. Phillips went on to illustrate, most eloquently, from English history, the present position of the country, and hoped for so strong a demonstration against Texas as should startle Winthrop from his treason, and make Choate tremble out of his nonentity. (Long continued applause.)

As to disunion, he continued, it must and will come. Calhoun wants it at one end of the Union—Garrison wants it at the other. It is written in the counsels of God. Meantime, let all classes, and orders, and interests unite in using the present hour, to prevent the consummation of this Annexation of Texas. (Continued cheering.)

Mr. E. WRIGHT said that in this way the advocates of Annexation were baffled in 1837.

☞ [And all our readers will recollect how in 1838 and '39, and up to the present hour, Mr Elizur Wright has labored, both at home and abroad, by calumny and misrepresentation, to break up the very movement on common ground, that procured that action of 1837, and which is, at this hour, the only movement on common ground, for the abolition of Slavery. All who heard it, will recollect his evening speech at the last New England Convention.—ED. STANDARD.]

Mr. T. S. HARLOW, of Middlesex county, moved the appointment of a committee, for the addition to the committee of nine, of such names as should be judged requisite.

ELLIS GRAY LORING, Esq. of Boston, said that there was no general State Committee existing, and that it had occurred to him that a jealousy might exist in the minds of men throughout the State, if Middlesex county should undertake to act for Massachusetts. The plan that had been last named was one that had been presented by his friend Mr. Sewall to the Liberty party Convention, and was by that body adopted with a proviso for the enlargement of the Liberty party Committee with the names of gentlemen from the other parties. But it had been found that an unwillingness existed to act as part of the organization of the Liberty party, and it had been, in consequence, suggested that this movement in Middlesex, was the movement with which to co-operate. He thought further, that all possible jealousies might be prevented by one more arrangement which he was about to propose.

It was, that this Convention adjourn for the purpose of immediately reorganizing as a State Convention, to take the requisite steps for the execution of the plan just presented.

WILLIAM SCHOULER, Esq. of Middlesex county, hoped that this motion would not prevail, since no such formalities of arrangement could alter the facts of the case. We could not really turn a County Convention into a State Convention by such a procedure.

E. R. HOAR, Esq. remarked that it was not our responsibility what gentleman chose to do in the interval between the meetings.

Mr. T. S. HARLOW, of Middlesex county, said the motion before the Convention was to appoint a new Committee of three, to select more names.

ELLIS GRAY LORING, Esq. of Boston, said he would move an adjournment, and then that Committee could be with more propriety selected, as we could not with propriety act in our present capacity as a State Convention.

EDMUND QUINCY, said that it would be well to have a clear understanding as to what was contemplated, since it seemed to him, that by the last proposed arrangement there might be a clashing of the two Committees acting on the same ground. We must take care not to interfere with any already existing arrangement in this case. He thought there could be no difficulty in the matter, and that we had better go on in the common channel marked out by the previous action.

Mr. Garrison rejoiced that old Middlesex should have the glory of leading in this movement for Liberty, as she had in old times, but hoped no jealousies about technicalities would mar a united effort. We had better dissolve at once if that were the case. It was melancholy and discouraging to have petty jealousies arise.

Ellis Gray Loring, Esq. had the most entire respect for the nine gentlemen composing the first Committee, and hoped they would all serve on the second.

The dinner hour having nearly arrived, the Convention adjourned to meet in the afternoon. The meeting, composed of those gentlemen who remained after the adjournment, immediately reorganized.

ELLIS GRAY LORING, Esq. of Boston, was called to the chair, and Edmund Quincy, of Norfolk county, nominated Secretary. Samuel E. Sewall, Esq. of Boston, read a series of resolutions, by which ——— were appointed as a State Committee. Mr. Sewall spoke warmly and eloquently in support of the action recommended by his resolution. His faith in the moral nature was strong.—We must rely on the moral principle. We had trusted too much to politics.

Mr. GARRISON hoped we should do nothing justly liable to exception. The chairman of the morning Convention had intimated to him that this was thought an unfair proceeding, and one that had no tendency to allay jealousies. He should hesitate.—

E. G. Loring, Esq. the Chairman of the noon meeting, said he must, as a question of order say, that the time for discussing the question of reorganization, had gone by, unless Mr. Garrison chose to move a reconsideration.

Hon. Henry Wilson, (President of the morning Convention,) rose to confirm the idea that the procedure had not been a satisfactory one, and he did not himself approve it.

Mr. SEWALL could not see any objection to it.

Hon. William Jackson, of Newton, begged leave to assure all present, that this was not a Liberty party measure. An individual had suggested it. Nothing unfair was intended.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, had not supposed it on the part of that individual with whom it originated. (Mr Sewall.) But the party of which he was a member, and many of its organs and advocates were, and ought in justice to be, objects of suspicion. They had endeavored to cast obstacles in the way of this Middlesex movement, in every town where efforts had been made to further and forward it. We had been held up as demagogues throughout the county, and though he knew that the gentleman with whom it originated, meant honestly and fairly, he knew the contrary of some of those with whom he was politically associated.

Mr. Sewall replied, that the truth was not responsible for the conduct of men; and his evident frankness, and zeal for the cause, as he urged all to sink party questions, and act on common ground for the human race, was an assurance to all present, of his entire unconsciousness of any views or feelings, but those dictated by the purest benevolence and integrity. A Committee of three was appointed to nominate a State Committee of twenty-five, who subsequently reported a list of names, of men of all parties and sects, among whom we recollect those of the Hon. Charles F. Adams, Hon. James M. Robbins, Hon. Stephen C. Phillips, and some others; with some whose names are odious with the people as Abolitionists, and others, as untrustworthy men;—these latter, named, we suppose, under a false view of liberality, and a mistaken idea of getting service out of them for the object in view.

☞ It is to be hoped, that men will, in the course of the Anti-Slavery enterprise, be taught the great and indispensable lesson, that America of all lands stands in need of; that no common ground can shelter unrepentant guilt from condemnation; and that the shadow of the altar of Freedom, is the last place to afford sanction for wrong.—[ED. STANDARD.]

Mr. GARRISON wished to say, that it was well known he had no love for Liberty party, but he had wished so to organize, as to get an active State Committee. Did his friend Wilson suppose, that the one raised at the Faneuil Hall meeting would be such a one?

Hon. HENRY WILSON did not suppose they would do much about it. What Mr. Sewall and Mr. Jackson had said, had released his mind of all apprehensions growing out of the re-organization of the meeting. He felt no opposition. He had felt it, and with reason, till the matter was explained.

The meeting was then adjourned sine die, and the new State Committee have met almost every day since, and will, it is warmly hoped, effect the work of keeping out Texas. Let all men, of every party, co-operate with them.

In the afternoon the Convention met, adopted all the resolutions of the morning unanimously, and that of Mr. Garrison by a small majority, and adjourned to meet at Lowell, on that day three weeks; and we trust that a vast concourse of people on the occasion, will justify the conviction of Wm. Schouler, Esq. of Lowell, expressed during the Convention, that there are not one hundred men in the county, who are not opposed to the Annexation of Texas.—C.

This Week's Paper.

The pro-slavery column is instructive. The Missouri editor is calculating on the "patriotism and firmness" of a large class of Northern people, to protect the "constitutional rights" of the slaveholders; in other words, to ensure the perpetuity of the system itself. A good representative of this class, the New Haven Courier, published at the very fountain-head of New England orthodoxy, thoroughly obedient to the sentiment of the people by whom it is supported, the legitimate and worthy descendants of those who would not let beer work on Sundays, asserts, in loud-mouthed abuse of the Abolitionists, the loyalty of the North to Southern tyranny. Poor slave! it knows very well that it cannot serve two masters. Should it be true to humanity and Christianity, the Southerners would send fewer students to Yale College, and there would be then less butter to their bread in New Haven. The article from the Courier is filled with falsehoods, but they are too palpable to need to be pointed out. The meaning of it all is that it loves to hide the sin of Slavery in the Church, and support it in the State.

We publish, this week, the statement, and subsequent letter of Mr. Giddings. The latter probably few of our readers have seen before. It is in the main, a repetition of the ideas which make up the "statement," but as both are valuable, I prefer to publish both. Everybody must respect and admire the unbending integrity, and sincere love of liberty and right of their author, however much they may differ from him in opinion. To him belongs the rare praise of being the only member of Congress who has been, in that body, the consistent advocate of the rights of the North, and of human rights. Slade, Adams, and some others, have been, to a certain extent; Giddings alone, and at all times, and on all occasions, where a jealous watchfulness made it necessary to act or speak against tyranny. It is strange that a man who sees so clearly what a curse the Union has been, should fail also to see that such it always will be, while Slavery is one of its elements. A "constitutional union" with slaveholders, is one in which, from the nature of the case, liberty must be sacrificed; for they will have no union in which either Slavery is not positively protected, or else negatively so, by being let alone. In either case, it is a compromise with evil, and no man, or nation, ever did that without a sacrifice of good. When Mr. Giddings's hatred of Slavery, for the sake of the South, shall equal his love of liberty for the sake of the North, the alternative with him will be, not "constitutional Union or Dissolution," but a Union with Freemen, or no Union at all.

The resolutions of the Convention at Geneva I commend to the consideration of all who desire that the elective franchise should be restored to the colored people. I have a word to say on this subject by and by.

There is not, I presume, a single reader of the Standard, who is not opposed to the death-penalty, and who will not be glad to read the excellent article by Rev. Mr. Holland—Unitarian minister at Rochester—on the fourth page. It will be finished next week.

The letter from Tennessee, on the same page, is copied by request. Mr. Holbrook's excellent system of education is growing fast into repute. For the old mode of teaching words, he substitutes the better one of teaching things. He takes his pupils out into the wide field of nature, and opens her vast store-houses, and from their treasures gives to the young mind experimental, and practical knowledge, which develops the intellectual being, and prepares them for the varied duties of life. In a word, he inculcates the acquisition of knowledge, which shall not be a useless burden, and would make that acquisition an attractive duty, and not a disagreeable task.

To Delinquent Subscribers.

Your day of grace has more than expired. All who have not paid up, will receive no more papers after this week. You may, however, expect letters periodically, till arrearages are paid. If in any case, there is any mistake in our accounts, it will be rectified on notice being given. We are sorry to part from any who have for several years been the readers of the Standard, but our duty to those whom we represent requires it. The subscriptions to the paper do not pay its expenses, and the Society cannot afford to circulate many gratuitous copies.

Anti-Slavery Paper in North Carolina.

The Cincinnati Herald gives an extract from a letter to a friend in Indiana, written by a person in Guilford county, North Carolina. It contains the announcement of an important movement about to commence in that State. The writer announces himself as a Liberty party man, and his determination to establish a paper if he receives the requisite assistance. He says:

"But the one great object of this epistle is this:—There is one man bold enough and philanthropic enough, to send out a Prospectus for an Anti-Slavery paper.

"But here is the point. He will be compelled to have 400 subscribers from the free states the first year. This will give the paper a start, after which, I think, its patronage here will support it. I say, and reiterate, that the existence of the paper rests with you."

If he will give his name, and that of the place of the proposed publication, no doubt, with proper effort, the 400 subscribers could be procured.

☞ We have given up nearly the whole of the space usually devoted to editorial, to the Report of the important anti-Texas meeting, at Cambridge. Several articles are crowded out, which will appear next week, and among them, one from Mrs. Chapman, which embodies the correspondence between James Haughton, of Dublin, and the Rev. Dr. Parkman, of Boston, mentioned in last week's paper.

☞ We have received by the kindness of friends in England and Ireland, several papers from which some interesting extracts will be given in the next paper. We have room this week only for the excellent letter of our friend Buffum, from Dublin.

ERRATA.—In last week's paper, in the resolution of B. F. A. S. S. on the Unitarian Protest, insert the words, "in response" to their British brethren, &c.

☞ Acknowledgments deferred.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

General Items.

☞ The Wilkesbarre Advocate says, "The potatoes raised in this section the last year or two having been more or less diseased, it gives us much pleasure to state that this year they are generally very fine. So far as we have been informed, the crop is a fair yield, and the potatoes generally sound."

Another verdict.—A man named Frost shot himself last Friday, in Providence, New Algiers, and the verdict of the Coroner's jury was,

"That the said Levi C. Frost came to his death by his own hand, against the peace and dignity of the State."

Heathen Subscribers.—A Sandwich Island paper says that for a whole year it had but one delinquent subscriber. Will some of our subscribers just compare their remissness in this respect, with the promptness of the heathen?—Vermont paper.

Thrsdauy, the 27th of November, has been set apart as a day of thanksgiving, in the State of Maryland.

Small Pox.—We have taken some pains to ascertain the extent of the disease in Alexander, and learn that the whole number of cases from its first appearance has been about thirty. Of those cases two only have proved fatal—seventeen have recovered, and eleven are now under medical treatment, none of which are considered dangerous, and most of them convalescent. We also learn that many of those cases have exhibited but very slight evidences of genuine small pox, having been of a very mild character, or of a modified form.—Batavia Times.

Thanks in Connecticut.—The Governor of Connecticut has issued his proclamation recommending Thursday, the 27th of November, to be observed as a day of Thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God.

The "Area of Freedom!"—The Charleston (S. C.) papers state that on Sunday evening week, about 150 blacks were carrying on their religious proceedings until after hours, (quarter past nine, P. M.) when Marshal Prince, having been informed of the fact, obtained a posse of the City Guard, and succeeded in arresting seventy of the culprits, who were dealt with as the law directs—that is, we presume, unmercifully flogged! Blows and stripes for worshipping God "after hours!"

Slave cases in Missouri.—The Supreme Court of Missouri, at its last term, uttered the following opinion:

"In suits for freedom a juror may be asked before he is sworn in chief if he feels bound in conscience to find a verdict in favor of the freedom of the slave, notwithstanding the law might hold him in slavery; and if the juror has any such scruples, it disqualifies him to act in such cases.

Another Victim of the "Swallow" Accident.—The remains of Mrs. Gibson, of Schenectady, who was on board the Swallow, at the time of the accident, were discovered on Thursday last, about two miles below Athens. The body can only be identified by a watch having her name on it.

Doctor Snodgrass.—The honorary degree of Master of Arts has been conferred on Dr. Snodgrass, editor of the Baltimore Visiter, by Jefferson College, at Cannonsburg, Pennsylvania.

Kiddnapping.—William R. Boswell was yesterday arrested by Capt. Winters, at the Lake end of the Pontchortrain railroad, on a charge of attemping to sell a free colored person, named Hillard Evans, as slave, to a gentleman of this city. Boswell is from Gainsville county, (N. C.) and employed Evans, who also lived there, as a servant. He will be examined before Recorder Baldwin, to-day.—N. O. Picayune, 26th.

A letter was received at Richmond, Va. from Nauvoo, dated October 3, which states—

"That the Mormons are to be paid for the property destroyed, and they are to leave the State in the Spring and go to California, but this is not publicly told. They have had three emissaries out exploring the country, and they have returned. The sites for their future cities are located, and they are delighted with the idea of settling there (in California) and establishing an empire of their own, which they will undoubtedly do."

The Enquirer says—

Immediately upon the perusal of the above, Gen. James A. Bennett remarked that he had written to New-York for 5,000 troops to meet him at Nauvoo, immediately, and Orson Pratt, one of the Twelve Apostles, told him that the Mormons in New-York could furnish 2,500 more. He says he himself will furnish six pieces of brass artillery, at a cost of $6000, from his own pocket, and that if he finds the above letter to be true, which he has no reason to doubt, he will have no objection to head the Grand Army in its passage over the Rocky Mountains in the Spring, to raise the standard of God and the Saints permanently, on the beautiful plains of the modern Eden, on the flowery banks of the Pacific.

Keep it in Mind—That in Rhode Island, every man who has not property to the amount of one hundred and thirty-four dollars, is obliged to pay the goverment ONE DOLLAR every year for the privilege of voting, while every man who possesses that amount of property, may vote in virtue of it, and without paying ONE CENT for the privilege. This is Rhode Island Algerine equality. Is there not need of reform?—Providence Gazette.

Dr. Dean.—A free negro under an indictment from St. Louis county, for grand larceny, was lodged in the jail of our county to-day, by the Marshal of St. Louis county. The Doctor, we are informed, reads and writes well, and, no doubt, will await his trial leisurly. St. Charles Advocate.

[This is the last that will be heard of the trial of Dr. Dean. The jail is so insecure that this negro will find no difficulty in breaking out at any time he may think proper, and the abolitionists will, no doubt, see that it is done.]—St. Louis Republican.

Highway Robbery.—An attempt was made a night or two ago, to rob a colored chicken merchant, named Sharp Halsey, 70 years of age, on the Causeway, between Newark and New-York. He was struck violently on the head, with a stone, which felled him, and the wagon passed over him. A team coming up, drove off the robbers, and Halsey was picked up, his head broken, and a finger smashed, which had to be amputated. He is doing well. The Newark Advertiser says that Sharp is a native of Morris County, and was born in Slavery, but his master, soon after he had grown up, gave him his freedom, and as he was always a sober, steady man, in a few years he acquired a snug farm by his industry and thrift. When his master died, the heirs claimed Sharp, and his earnings, as still belonging to the estate,—no manumission papers having been given to him. But the people of the neighborhood took the matter in hand, collected affidavits of the frequent declarations of his former deceased master, that he had set him free, was glad to see him doing so well, &c.; and laid his case before the Legislature for relief. A special act was passed, establishing his liberty, and confirming him in the title and possession of his property.—Sun.

"Varmints."—According to the following extract of a letter published in the N. O. Picayune, written by an officer of the army at Corpus Christi—the post occupied by Gen. Taylor's "Army of Occupation," cannot be particularly desirable:

7TH INFANTRY CAMP,
CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS, Sept. 30, 1845.

* * * Florida may be the "land of promise," but Texas is the land of "varmints." In clearing the ground to pitch my tent, I killed a water moccasin; about 3 o'clock in the morning, I was wakened up by the barking of a dog; he had just run a rattlesnake out of my neighbor's tent, when the rattling and barking aroused me—9 rattles—captured. I again laid down, and when day broke, a yellow-necked lizard was cocking his eye cunningly, from the ridge-pole of my tent. I sprang up, seized my boot to despatch him, when lo! out of the boot dropped a tarantula! Exhausted from fright, and fatigue, I sank back into a chair; but no sooner down, than I was compelled rapidly to abandon the position, having been stung in the rear by a scorpion! * * *

Besides the above mishaps, he lost a valuable dog by a shark. The dog had jumped overboard from a boat, to follow his master to the shore, when the voracious monster caught him.

A black man, a runaway slave from the South, crossed the Detroit river one morning last summer, and not being sure of his whereabouts, he skulked around behind barns and fences, until falling in with some of his race, he slyly accosted them, and inquired of them the shortest route to Canada, to which they replied, "get away nigger, you fool, you are in Canada, this be Canada." The runaway stood motionless for a moment, looking at his informants, and then jumping up and down as nearly perpendicular as his bow legs would permit, and wheeling around and around, slapping back his coat tail with both hands, exclaimed, "is I free"—"is I free?"—"is I free?" between each exclammation blowing off steam in a manner peculiar to his race.—Daily Advertiser.

Suspected Abolitionists.—Four individuals, clad in the Quaker garb, who recorded their names as Josiah Forster, William Forster, George Stacy and John Allen, arrived here and put up at Mr. Cowton's hotel on Saturday evening last, and busied themselves during the greater part of the following day in calling at the dwellings of our free colored population. Their excessive familiarity with the negroes excited no little attention. Their conduct was of such a character, as to induce the belief that they were the agents of some abolition society. A gentle hint was given them, that it would be advisable for them to make their stay in town as short as possible. They left, taking the Western route, the following morning. It is supposed by some, that they are the committee appointed by the general convention of the Abolitionists of England, which assembled several weeks since in the city of London, to visit this country and gather all the information in their power concerning the negro population of the State—doubtless with a view to the establishment of a system, on an extensive scale, whereby slaves may be abducted from their masters.—Cumberland Alleganian.

Texas Naval Officers.—It is expected that these officers will be taken into the United States Navy. Commodore Moore it is presumed will be nominated as post captain. The Texas army has been disbanded. There are no army officers, therefore, now in the Texan service.

End of the Pittsburgh Strike!—The difficulties between the manufacturers and laborers of Pittsburgh have at length been amicably settled—at least for the present. The terms of compromise will appear from the following official record:

At a large meeting of the operatives of the different cotton factories in Allegheny City, held at the Ark on the 17th instant called by a Committee of their body, upon whose invitation the proprietors also attended, Mr. John Marshall was appointed Chairman, and Mr. John Dyer Secretary. The meeting being thus organized, the following questions were put to the proprietors, viz:

1. Are the manufacturers willing to adopt the ten-hour system if it becomes general in the United States?

2. If the hands go to work under the old system will you dismiss any for continuing their efforts to obtain the establishment of the ten-hour system throughout the country?

3. Are the manufacturers willing to start their mills on Monday morning next, if they can each get one hundred hands?

Which being answered satisfactorily, the proprietors withdrew. Whereupon it was moved and seconded that the hands present agree to go to work on Monday morning next, which motion, after discussion, was decided in the affirmative.

JOHN MARSHALL, Chairman.
JOHN DYER, Secretary. October 17, 1845.

Keeper of an Intelligence Office Convicted.—In the Municipal Court yesterday, Joshua Buffom was put on trial for cheating Sarah J. Nutter out of fifty cents, under pretence of supplying her with a place in the family of Mr. Asa B. Hogins. It appeared from the evidence, that Mr. Hogins had told Buffom not to send any more females to his house, for employment in his family, yet afterward he did send the complainant to Mr. H.'s house, and informed her that he wanted a housekeeper. Judge Cushing charged the Jury, that if the keeper of an Intelligence Office received a fee for information, he was bound to know that what he stated was true; and if he knew that the information was false, and obtained the fifty cents in consequence of giving it, the offence of cheating by false pretences, was made out, if the Jury were satisfied from all the evidence that the defendant intended to defraud. The smallness of the amount was not to be taken into consideration in determining the question. The Jury returned a verdict of "guilty."—Boston Post, Tuesday.

For Liberia.—The fine, commodious, and well-known ship Roanoke, commanded by Capt. Alexander B. Hanna, will be despatched from this port, some time during the latter part of the present week, by the Maryland State Colonization Society, with one hundred and eighty emigrants for Cape Palmas. She is now lying at Corner's wharf, Fell's point, fitting out for her contemplated expedition. The Society could not have selected a more suitable vessel, nor a more efficient commander.—Baltimore American.

Died.

At Columbia, Herkimer County, Ohio, on the 15th August last, Mrs. MARY BENEDICT, wife of Mr. Elias Benedict, and sister of the late Jacob Hagerman, Esq. of this city, aged nearly 80 years.

Though no proud monument or costly urn
Now marks the spot where now thy kindred mourn,
Yet shall thy memory deeply be imprest
On every heart, and dwell in every breast:
Thy virtues, too, shall live, and still be found
To shed a heavenly influence wide around;
Whilst all shall wish, and all shall hope and sigh,
Like thee to live, and, too, like thee to die.

Salem, Oct. 5, 1845.

TO THE ABOLITIONISTS OF EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Are you ready, dear friends, to commence with us preparations for the Pennsylvania Fair of 1845? Warm hearts and active hands we would enlist, at this early period, that no time may be lost which might be profitably spent in this service. Information respecting what is to be done, it can scarcely be necessary to offer to those who, year by year, have been laboring side by side with us in this department of Anti-Slavery toil, and whose skill and ingenuity have been again and again proved. We want whatever liberal souls will devise, and ready hands execute. The Committee commence their efforts this year with the hope of making the Fair superior to those of preceding years, but this hope cannot, of course, be realized, without your dilligent and hearty co-operation. On this we rely. Need we urge upon you motives to action? The slave has found no respite from his sufferings shall we seek respite from our labors in his behalf? Trusting that you are as ready for this work as ourselves, we suggest that you should immediately begin to inquire what you can give or do for this purpose, and how you can best enlist the services of your friends and neighbors. Will some active friends of the cause take measures for forming sewing circles in their neighborhoods, where articles may be manufactured, donations deposited, and interest excited for the Fair? From such a measure, much benefit, beside pecuniary emolument, results to the Anti-Slavery cause. Will not the friends of the cause in Chester, Bucks, and other counties, adopt this plan, and furnish tables, to be superintended by themselves at the Fair? And will not those who cannot conveniently unite with these circles, be diligent and faithful in individual effort? Of all the friends of the slave in city and country, we ask aid. Of the merchant, we ask contributions of merchandise, of the mechanic, the fruit of his handiwork; of the farmer, the produce of his garden, fields, and poultry-yard. But we ask of all only the products of free and requited labor.

Let us, dear friends, commence our efforts with a determination that our next Fair shall yield great and good results to our cause, and it will do so.

THE TWELFTH MASSACHUSETTS

Anti-Slavery Fair,

TO BE HELD IN

FANEUIL HALL,

AT THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

The undersigned, deeply sensible of the obligations of those who begin a work of beneficent reform to carry it forward to the end of their lives, have determined to continue, during the present, as in the eleven preceding years, to disseminate the moral principles, and awaken the feelings which alone can effect the abolition of Slavery.

If we needed fresh stimulus in a work, which perpetually renews the devoted spirit, we could not fail to find it in the present condition of our country. The supporters of Slavery, perceiving that the practice and the preaching of a higher morality, endangers the perpetuity of their system, hope by the annexation of Texas to maintain the balance of power in its favor. But Freedom can gain at the North faster than Slavery at the South, if those who call themselves friends of Freedom, will but labor with zeal and diligence in her behalf.

Our appeal is, in an especial manner, to those who are newly awakened to the nature of Slavery, and its unavoidable termination in political subjugation, and national ruin:—and, who earnestly desire to avoid the fatal consequences of the atrocious deed of Texan Annexation. If the people were awake to the importance of this question of Annexation to the welfare, to the honor, to the very existence of the UNITED STATES, as such, they would speak with one voice from every city, county and town throughout the free States, in that decisive tone which would settle the question in the negative at once and forever!—which would sunder any such connection already formed, as threads are parted by flame.

It is to awaken—to inform—to inspire the American people with a sense of what they owe their times, their race, and themselves, that we propose this effort, to be carried on through the year, and to be concluded in December next, with THE TWELFTH MASSACHUSETTS A. S. FAIR. Wherever, the country over, there is a single person professing an interest in the cause, whose eye this shall meet, let that person instantly commence operations for THE FAIR, and interest as many others as possible for its success.

We have the pleasure of announcing to those who have aided us the last year, that but little remains on hand of the contributions of the last Fair. The whole will have been converted into money before the next, and employed in supplying lecturers and publications. Let no one shrink from the duty of aiding us, because he does not deem the Anti-Slavery lecturers and publications the best possible;—our object is to arouse those whose office it should have been to bear the truth to us: those whom all confess to be, by their prudence, mildness, judiciousness, and position, rightly qualified for the work we have undertaken, if they could but be induced to undertake it. From among these, we fervently hope, will arise, such as shall put to shame all former advocates, by their devotedness, their zeal, their diligence, and their disinterestedness.

We request for the cause's sake, the immediate formation of Anti-Slavery working clubs, for the aid of THE FAIR. Men can do as much for it as women, by furnishing the requisite funds; by making articles for it, as time permits,—the best specimens of their mechanical ingenuity, and manufacturing skill,—by sending the fruits of their agricultural industry. We ask not for the formation of sewing-circles only, but for working-clubs of every description. They may be made the medium of a happier social intercourse than commonly prevails. They may be reading societies and working societies, while their object is the promotion of the Anti-Slavery cause.

We ask of all our friends, and the friends of the cause, and the opposers of Texan Annexation throughout the country, to take the action above indicated. We ask of all such in this city, donations of money or materials, or orders for such articles as they prefer to purchase at the Fair.

Of the opposers of Annexation, we feel that we have a double right to ask aid: for have not our efforts aroused them to a sense of the danger and the wrong, and are not their efforts consequently due to awaken those who yet slumber over it? It is not more imminent now, than during all these years between 1835 and 1845, which they have slept away, while we watched and worked. Requite, now, to others, the good for which we should scorn the thought of a return to ourselves. We desire only to give the advantage of our personal exertions and experience in making this requital as extensively beneficial as economy and knowledge of the ground can do.

Donations and communications may be addressed to M. W. CHAPMAN, 25 Cornhill, office of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, or to either of the undersigned:—

TUBAL CAIN.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

Old Tubal Cain was a man of might
In the days when earth was young;
By the fierce red light of his furnace bright
The strokes of his hammer rung;
And he lifted high his brawny hand
On the iron glowing clear,
Till the sparks rushed out in scarlet showers,
As he fashioned the sword and spear.
And he sang—"Hurra for my handiwork!
Hurra for the spear and sword!
Hurra for the hand that wields them well,
For he shall be king and lord!"

To Tubal Cain came many a one,
As he wrought by his roaring fire,
And each one pray'd for a strong steel blade
As the crown of his desire;
And he made them weapons sharp and strong,
Till they shouted loud for glee,
And gave him gifts of pearl and gold,
And spoils of the forest free.
And they sang—"Hurra for Tubal Cain,
Who has given us strength anew!
Hurra for the smith, and hurra for the fire,
And hurra for the metal true!"

But a sudden change came o'er his heart
Ere the setting of the sun,
And Tubal Cain was filled with pain
For the evil he had done;
He saw that men, with rage and hate,
Made war upon their kind,
That the land was red with the blood they shed,
In their lust for carnage blind.
And he said—"Alas! that ever I made,
Or that skill of mine should plan,
The spear and the sword for men whose joy
Is to slay their fellow-man!"

And for many a day old Tubal Cain
Sat brooding o'er his woe;
And his hand forbore to smite the ore,
And his furnace smoulder'd low.
But he rose at last with a cheerful face,
And a bright, courageous eye,
And bared his strong arm for the work,
While the quick flames mounted high.
And he sang—"Hurra for my handiwork!"
And the red sparks lit the air;
"Not alone for the blade was the bright steel made!"
And he fashioned the first ploughshare.

And men, taught wisdom from the past,
In friendship joined their hands,
Hung the sword in the hall and the spear on the wall,
And plough'd the willing lands;
And sang—"Hurra for Tubal Cain!
Our staunch good friend is he;
And for the ploughshare and the plough
To him our praise shall be.
But while oppression lifts its head,
Or a tyrant would be lord,
Though we may thank him for the plough
We'll not forget the sword."

THE SHOEMAKERS.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Ho! workers of the old time styled
The Gentle Craft of Leather!
Young brothers of the ancient guild,
Stand forth once more together!
Call out again your long array
In the olden, merry manner;
Once more on gay St. Crispin's day
Fling out your blazoned banner!

Rap, rap! upon the well-worn stone
How falls the polished hammer!
Rap, rap! the measured sound has grown
A quick and merry clamor.
Now shape the sole: now deftly curl
The glossy vamp around it,
And bless the while the bright-eyed girl
Whose gentle fingers bound it!

For you along the Spanish Main
A hundred keels are plowing:
For you the Indian on the plain
His lasso-coil is throwing:
For you deep glens with hemlock dark
The woodman's fire is lighting;
For you upon the oak's grey bark
The woodman's axe is smiting.

For you from Carolina's pine
The resin-gum is stealing,
For you the dark-eyed Florentine
Her silken skein is reeling:
For you the dizzy goatherd roams
His rugged Alpine ledges;
For you round all her shepherd homes
Bloom England's thorny hedges!

The foremost still by day or night
On moated mound or heather,
Where'er the need of trampled right
Brought toiling men together,
Where the free burghers from the wall
Defied the mail-clad master,
Than yours, at Freedom's trumpet call,
No craftsmen rallied faster!

Let fopplings sneer, let fools deride,
Ye heed no idle scorner,
Free hands and hearts are still your pride,
And duty done, your honor.
Ye dare to trust for honest fame
The jury Time empanels,
And leave to Truth each noble name
Which glorifies your annals.

Thy songs, Hans Sach, are living yet,
In strong and hearty German,
And Bloomfields lay, and Gifford's wit,
And the rare good sense of Sherman;
Still from his book, a mystic seer,
The soul of Behemen teaches,
And England's priestcraft quakes to hear
Of Fox's leathern breeches.

The foot is yours: where'er it falls
It treads your well-wrought leather
On earthen floor, in marble halls,
On carpet, or on heather.
Still there the sweet charm is found
Of matron grace or vestal's,
As Hebe's foot bore nectar round
Among the old celestials!

Rap, rap!—your stout and bluff brogan,
With footsteps slow and weary,
May wander where the sky's blue span
Shuts down upon the prairie.
Ye slippers shine on beauty's foot,
By Saratoga's fountain!
Or lead, like snow-flakes falling mute,
The dance on Catskill mountain!

The red brick to the mason's hand,
The brown earth to the tiller's;
The shoe in yours shall wealth command
Like fairy Cindrella's!
As they who shunned the household maid,
Beheld the crown upon her,
So all shall see your toil repaid
With health, and home, and honor.

Then let the toast be freely quaffed
In WATER cool and brimming:
"All honor to the good old craft,
Its merry men and women!"
Call out again your long array
In the old time's pleasant manner;
Once more on gay St. Crispin's day
Fling out his blazoned banner!

Miscellany.

MARIE; OR Slavery in the United States.

BY GUSTAVE DE BEAUMONT.

Author of Travels in Ireland; and, in conjunction with de Tocqueville, of "Penitentiary System of the United States."

(Translated for the Standard.)

CHAPTER XI.—[CONCLUDED.]
The Trial—in Continuation.

"In England, where birth and wealth are all in all, the upper classes, with their elegance of manners, can with difficulty bear with the ordinary ones of the cit, and the plebeian; the latter feel constantly the need of an excuse for their condition.—In America, on the contrary, it is the rich man who has to ask pardon for his luxury and his polish of manner. In England, sovereignty comes from above; in the United States, from below.

"The cause that renders the Americans eminently sociable, is, perhaps, the same which prevents them from being polished: there is no privileged class to excite envy, but then there is no superior class to serve, by its elegance, as a model for the rest.

"For my own part, I prefer, I acknowledge it, the involuntary coarseness of the plebeian, to the insolent politeness of the courtier.

"I further admired among the Americans, a quality most valuable in a free people—good sense. I believe that in no country in the world does there exist so much of reason, universally diffused, as in the United States.

"There are countries of Europe in which the same moral or political question receives a thousand different and contradictory solutions. One is sure, on the contrary, to find the Americans agreed on almost all the principles of public and private life.—You will find no one who denies the utility of religious faith, and the obligation to respect the laws.

"Every man knows all that is going on in his country, weighs it with sagacity, and speaks of it only with reserve, and after reflection.

"The Americans have the habit and the love of travelling, and almost every man has, at least once in his life, traversed the space between the Canada frontier and the Gulf of Mexico. Thus experience adds to the natural correctness of their good sense. You find among them no exclusive admiration for the old, nor stupid astonishment at the new; neither inveterate prejudices, nor ridiculous superstitions.

"The excellence of their good sense is owing, perhaps, to the fewness of their passions; what leads me to think so is, that overcome by national pride, the most intense of all their sentiments, they lose their reason entirely.

"Their want of taste for poetry, for the fine arts, and the speculative sciences, is still in their favor, under this point of view. Man wanders less from his route, when he follows neither the swift impulses of imagination, nor the dazzling rays of genius.

"The dreamy philosopher, the savant, whose thoughts are ever turned to the heavens, he who is moved by a touching harmony of nature, seldom comprehends the practical details of life.

"This power of reason, this superiority of good sense over the passions, serves to explain the admirable sang-froid of the Americans. Inaccessable to great joys, the inhabitant of the United States is overcome by no misfortune. The most unexpected blow, the most imminent peril, find him immoveable. Singular contrast! he follows fortune with extreme ardor, and supports every mishap with calmness. Nothing stops him in his enterprises; nothing discourages him in his efforts. He never says in view of any obstacle, how great soever it may be, 'I cannot.' Hardy, patient, indefatigable, he tries. This people is strictly faithful to its origin; for it was born of exile; and men who traversed two thousand leagues of ocean to find a country, have surely a fund of energy of soul.

"No one, under this point of view, can more than I, admire the people of the United States. It is this reason, this practical good sense, this audacious enterprise, that have given birth to American industry, of which the prodigies are so astonishing. Behold these canals that emulate rivers, whose destiny is one day to reunite the Pacific with the Atlantic; those roads of iron which glide through the heart of mountains, and on which, steam rushes along with more rapidity and power, than over the smooth surface of the water; these manufactures which rise up from all parts; these counting-houses, enriched by the commerce of the world; these ports where everywhere wealth and abundance: fertile fields, for uncultured forests; for deserts, magnificent cities and smiling villages, sprung from the ground as by some unknown magic, as if the aged soil of America, so long savage and barbarian, was great at length with civilized futurity:—as if its fruitful bosom should in like manner as it has brought forth forests, engender harvests without cultivation, and cities without toil.

"Bristle a thousand masts;"

"Witnessing this prosperity unrivalled among other nations, I admired, and I admire it still; but it is all material; and it is a moral world that I stand in need of.

"Ah! why have not the Americans as much heart as head? Why so much intellect without genius, so much wealth without splendor, so much energy without greatness, so many marvels without poetry?

"Perhaps the industrial character which here marks society, forms a part of the very order of national destiny."—

Here Ludovic paused, but at the moment that his lips were silent, his look became more expressive.—One might easily see that his silent thought was profoundly engaged. At length, with a voice which announced something of poetic inspiration, he gave utterance to these words in the silence of the solitude.

[TRANSLATOR'S NOTE.—To this chapter there is a long and very interesting commentary on the points of universal equality, prejudice in general, and self-possession of Americans.]

From the Saturday Emporium.

THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.*

BY REV. FREDERICK W. HOLLAND.

We have waited long in patient expectation that this subject would be treated by some powerful pen in our favorite journal. But, as yet, this branch of reform has called forth fewer writers than any other. Only here and there one has risen to notice on either side of the subject, by presumption or prejudice, by fervent humanity or stoic severity, by generous courtesy or overbearing dictation toward opponents. And, if we mistake not, there is a growing desire to see and know, and hear and judge, far beyond the means of present gratification. After the excitement of a protracted debate, we are very likely to over-estimate the interest of the community in a subject which has interested us so deeply, but no other philanthropic discussion seems to meet with such eager, divided, and passionate treatment. Our present purpose is, in the briefest possible compass, to present some of the strongest objections to what has been strangely enough termed a signal emblem of Christian civilization. We shall give, without the labor of formal quotation, the leading points in the graceful essay of Dymond, the sophistical reasoning of Cheever, the miscellaneous collection of Spear, and the masterly report of O'Sullivan: that is, we shall make the best possible use of the best materials at hand.

There is no little rubbish to be removed at the start. The advocates of the gallows lean confidently upon a certain prediction in the ninth chapter of Genesis, which they translate into a command; and, upon the injunction of blood for blood, in the Jewish code. These they regard as sufficient justification for the custom in all coming time. Six thousand more years of progress would not pass, they think, this fixed point: the very highest imaginable development of society would not outgrow this ancient warning against the crime of Cain.

We will not be needlessly tedious in these drier matters. The Rev. G. B. Cheever thus speaks of the passage in Genesis, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," "The hand that drew the rainbow across the sky in sign that storms prepare to part, wrote this statute in lines no more to be effaced till the destruction of all things, than the colors of the rainbow can be blotted from the sky, while lasts the constitution of this physical universe. And, as in every conflict of the elements that might fill man's soul with terror, this bow of mercy should span the clouds with glittering arch, so that in every storm of human passion that rises to the violence of death, this statute, as a bow of promise, is God's assurance to the world against the anarchy of murder." This is strong, bold, distinct language. It asserts for what, as a prophecy, was and is singularly true, the authority of a universal, illimitable, everlasting edict of Heaven. He forgets to observe that the 4th, 5th, and 6th verses each contain, according to this reasoning, a universal law; and yet, we presume to select one and reject the others, without any apparent discrimination in the sacred narrative, without any pretended permission from Deity. We eat the blood of beasts, though this passage in Genesis expressly forbids it; and, we not only do not require, we do not permit, "every man's brother" to take the life of the murderer of his relative. This essentially shatters, if it does not overthrow, the main position of the advocates of capital punishment. They pick out one pretended injunction from a multitude of exploded ordinances, whose company spreads a graveyard atmosphere over the whole; and this, forsooth, is perpetual, the rest temporary—this society cannot outgrow, the rest society has cast off as a worn-out cloak—this was positively designed for all the living and to live, those only for that dispensation and the next.

But, we have something more positive to offer. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall," &c. It may be wilful blindness, but we cannot possibly see anything in this save a prophecy similar to the words of the covenant, "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword;" a prophecy of what was ordinarily to occur under the righteous government of God, and his permission of that free play demanded by the passions in a passionate age. As a prophecy, it has been wonderfully made good. Men of blood do not live out half their days. Professor Upham relates, that, of a gang of thirty smugglers, who beat an exciseman to death on the coast of England, and none of whom were punished for that crime, all but one died by violence; and he, who had made this confession on a dying bed, had only kept watch during the murder. All experience proves that "murder will out," and the general usage of mankind hitherto has hastened to wreak upon it the dictates of a revengeful spirit. And yet, probably, every existing Government restrains this prophecy, or limits this precept, in at least half of its scope. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood" is the unqualified sentence. Yet, the homicide is NOT punished with death, the insane slayer is not, the murderer in self-defence, or in the battle-field is not, the destroying beast is not always. So much for an unrepealed, illimitable law of the Governor of the Universe. He has provided in the eternal fitness of things, in the unquestionable promptings of nature, a material modification of what the friends of humanity now are seeking to modify just a little more.

The Mosaic code is next resorted to by the supporters of the existing criminal law, in confidence of an easy triumph. This "moral rainbow of the universe," the gibbet, arches over this entire system.—Life was taken for very many, and some very slight offences. The whole law was steeped in blood: yet, was no doubt more humane than the systems which surrounded it, and far above the habits of the nation to whom it came; as far above, I believe, as was consistent with its securing the obedience of the newly emancipated serfs of Egypt. But, when we remember that the system was intended to be a preparation for something better, and that the nation to whom it was addressed were at once fickle and stubborn, we can hardly expect men will receive on its authority the most savage custom of modern times. It cannot surely surprise a rational mind, that a system which has from its Alpha to its Omega, eye for eye, and tooth for tooth, which made the picking up of sticks on the Sabbath, the permission of liberty to a dangerous ox, capital offences, should legalize the exaction of blood for blood. And it cannot but surprise a rational mind, that, after so many centuries, and under an entirely different religious system, having for our Master him who says: "It was said by them of old time, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, but, I say unto you, resist not evil," that nine-tenths of the religious community should uphold the gallows mainly because it was permitted to the Jews some three thousand years ago.

Two facts throw great light upon this permission, and at the same time forbid our assumption of the like barbarous license. First, the death-punishment in the institutions of Moses, was the greatest possible modification of existing customs. All was done that could be done to secure the unhappy murderer a fair trial. A city of refuge was located here and there, where the revenge of the next of kin could not reach him. Sometime had to elapse in which the hot blood could get cool, and sentiments of humanity spring up. Escape from the last suffering, for what might have been an innocent mistake, was ever in one's power. There was no little mercy in the very law, which (perverted to a modern exigency) strikes us with so much horror. We should remember, as Mr. Salvador well remarks, the Jew had no thought of preventing crime, hardly any of reforming the criminal. His single idea, like that of the savage of our day, was to cut off the diseased limb of the body politic. He had no thought of any cure. Humanity was not for long ages to rise so high. And only, when it can be shown that our opinions, customs, and institutions correspond to those of Egypt's oppressed bondsmen, may their law of blood be repeated with safety, even upon the gatherer of sticks on a Sabbath, and not a moment before. Unnumbered passages occur in the New Testament showing, as Jesus himself says, that "for the hardness of the Jewish heart" many a precept was written, or, as the epistle to the Hebrews expresses it, "that there is a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof."

A second character of the Jewish law is still more decisive. Deity himself was regarded as the head of the Jewish nation, the executor of its laws, the moving appeal in every case of doubt, the actual though unseen Judge. Thus, one of the strongest objections to our infliction of this irremediable punishment, that the innocent have suffered and will suffer instead of the guilty, because men are not omniscient, had no force thus. The true culprit was detected. The rightful object of punishment met his dues. But, as no existing tribunal pretends to the wisdom of the All-seer, as a majority of murderers are sentenced upon merely circumstantial evidence, as the innocent frequently suffer in room of the real culprits, the second justifying circumstance of the Mosaic case will not bear application to our times.

It ought to be sufficient in this community, however, to maintain that revelation is necessarily progressive—that what is divinely adapted to one state of society may be divinely unadapted to another—that the new garment must not be pieced out with the old cloth—that regulations, excellent, useful, and blessed in their appointed time and place, may be, like the prohibition of the eating of blood, foolish if not pernicious among us, under wholly different relations. The folly, of course, rests upon their heads who disinter these reverently-buried bodies to worship them as deities; who, like the Turkish jailors, chain the living to the festering dead; who will not suffer the law to bring us as a schoolmaster to Christ.

Something might be said in this connection of the commandment, "thou shalt not kill," as reiterated by Jesus, without any qualification, exception, or limitation—without any hiding-place for the sanction of killing those who have themselves killed.—But, we must hasten to other thoughts. We remember that our Saviour was but once called upon to pass sentence of death, upon a confessed criminal too, the perpetrator of one of the worst of crimes, and, so far from giving the expected sign, and satisfying the Pharisee's blood-hound appetite, he simply says to the trembling culprit, "Neither do I condemn thee. Go and sin no more." And, whatever use may be made of two allusions in the epistles to the habit of the tribunals of that day, when our blessed Lord himself fell a victim to the sanguinary edicts of his day, when he came "not to destroy men's lives but to save," when love is the fulfilling of his law, when its word is, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice," and "it hath been said thou shalt hate thine enemy, but I say unto you love your enemies"—he must be blind, indeed, who cannot see an immense change, from Moses to Christ, in this very thing. The teachings of Christianity seems, to us, too plain to ever justify our consuming time on this portion of the subject.

Taking for granted that the peculiar message of Christ needs no formal repetition to his professed disciples, we proceed to what seems an insuperable objection to the death-punishment, "its implied omniscience in its administrators." This very weighty charge against the commission of a new crime, in retaliation for one perhaps already repented, has never been met: it never can be met. Were the public informed as to the frequency of such fatal mistakes by our own tribunals, there could not be another execution, at least in the Northern States. "Till the infallibility of human judgments be proved to me," was the declaration in the French Chamber of Deputies of one whose name thrills every American bosom, "I shall persist in demanding the abolition of the punishment of death." These words of Lafayette cannot be understood by any who have not given a particular attention to the subject. It is necessary under the present state of things, that, by the doom of death we should sometimes inflict on an innocent fellow-being an irreparable injury. One reason of this is, that the best writers agree that it is impossible to detect insanity in all cases. The assassin of the English Minister, Percival, was discovered after his execution to have been merely insane; but, as the excuse is set up in almost every case, the jury have generally very little patience with it, even were their information sufficient to guide them to a just decision as to one's mental soundness. Again, by an examination of the criminal calendar in one of our States, for several successive years, we find that the great majority are condemned on merely circumstantial evidence. A community is maddened by some fresh tale of outrage—some friendless vagrant, or suspected profligate is pointed at by a fatherless rumor—by and by, some malicious things are remembered, or imagined to have been dropped about the murdered by the supposed culprit; thus, some sufficient cause is found for the deed—last of all, the man fails to give a satisfactory explanation of his whereabouts at the moment—his execution follows without the appearance of hesitation on any part. Often, the real culprit surrounds some doubtful character with such a net of circumstances, that by the aid of a little perjury the innocent shall suffer for the guilty; and, as in the case recorded by the historian, Smollett, the actual criminals embrace and encourage their miserable victim upon the very instrument of death, where their crimes have made him stand.

A few of the more prominent cases we abridge from the very able New-York Report. Groans have been heard to come from a chamber, a man has been discovered bending over a murdered body, his lantern in the left hand, in the right a knife dropping with blood, his face horror-stricken, his answers suspicious: well, years after he is executed it is proved that he was only the first spectator of the crime which had palsied him with terror. A father has been found in an outhouse murdered, only a refractory son being at home, whose gain by immediate possession of property were motive enough for the act, the shoe print in the snow is his, the hammer which gave the death-blow is found blood-stained in his drawer—he suffers in consequence, protesting his innocence, and long years after his sister confesses to the successful ingenuity which set up the innocent to screen the guilty. Two men have been seen fighting in a field; they are old enemies; after a while, one is found dead, and the pitchfork which did the work is that of the murdered man's known foe, and was borne by him to the field that very day: but, long after judgment has been rendered according to these treacherous appearances, the real criminal has been detected among the jury who were so confident of the guilt of the accused. The tavern-keeper has been charged by his own servants with the murder of a traveller; one seeing the very act, another at very early dawn detecting his master burying the stolen money in a very secret way in the garden, which the master confesses to have done—of course, the gibbet closes his history, the real murderers being the principal proofs of his guilt. A father and daughter are heard in violent dispute: she cries "cruelty, death," and the like: he comes out, locks the door, and shortly after low moans are heard, and the apartment being forcibly entered, she is found weltering in blood. The father is executed under the overwhelming weight of this complete chain of evidence in satisfaction for the wild deed of a suicide! Nay: multiplied instances are on record, as for instance in the old trials for witchcraft, where the accused have confessed their guilt, and yet died innocent. One of the Bournes, in Vermont, confessed the murder of Colvin, when, just as the fatal cap was closing his brother's eyes forever, a cry was heard, "For God's sake stop," and the murdered Colvin himself appeared. This is the strongest case we have anywhere met with, though, in our own vicinity, an experience of the peril of sitting in judgment over human life somewhat similar to this occurred. And, at one assizes in England, no less than six innocent persons, as was afterward found, were hanged.

A VOICE FROM TENNESSEE.

Mr. Josiah Holbrook,—Sir:—Last spring I got a box of your apparatus, and am satisfied with the purchase. In the box I find "the Self-Instructor," of May and November, 1844. The perusal of these has interested me; and presuming from them that you would cheerfully communicate any information in your power on the subject of education, I take the liberty to address you this letter.

In the first place, I request you to send me all the numbers of the Self-Instructor; and if it is continued, consider me a subscriber. You have convinced me that geometry, geology, geography, and botany, and I would, zoology, are the first sciences for children to learn. Observation and classification become, thereby, early and fixed habits of the mind, and they are the only habits by which the mind can be improved.

In the next place, I would ask of you the favor to give me a catalogue of books that would constitute a complete course of juvenile instruction, such as a child could be kept progressing in from the time he could read and write. Some very simple and brief geology, botany, natural philosophy, chemistry, astronomy, zoology, and so throughout the range of natural and moral science. I do not like systematic botany. It should be altogether elementary. I have thought that a juvenile course of the primer order, embracing the simplest rudiments of all the sciences, should be put into the hands of beginners. Nothing should be in the book but what they are to learn. They are thus introduced to science, and if it is well done, they will desire a further acquaintance. Suitable apparatus for illustration should go along with it invariably. Even to let them know that there is such a science as chemistry, geology, &c. &c. and to give them some little idea of what it means, would inspire them with a desire to look further into it after they had graduated in their first course—the primer course, I would call it. After completing a course like this, I would turn them back to geology, botany, &c. upon a larger scale.

You now understand me. Is there such a first course in existence? Also, such a second course as I have mentioned; the prices at which they can be had, with suitable apparatus in each department? If there is not, what would you think of a periodical devoted to such a first and second course? And which should propose to accommodate subscribers with simple apparatus? One number in primer form containing the rudiments of botany; another geology, another chemistry, &c. through history, geography, moral philosophy, and all science—all emanating from the same mind, and forming a connected series. It would seem to me that such a work, well executed, and cheap, would be patronized. Then a second course, on the same plan, with simple grammars of ancient and modern languages, would fill out my idea of a useful periodical. It is such a one as I would patronize more devotedly than any I have ever seen or heard of.

I am not a teacher, but a judge of the circuit courts of Tennessee. Convinced of the importance of popular education, I am determined to give what poor influence I may have, on the bench, in the social circle, and through our political journals, to the first periodical I can see that favors the above scheme, and to the first course of books I can find of the above description.

Education must commence in early infancy—almost in babyhood—in simple attractive form—cheap, very cheap, too, or it cannot succeed. I wish to make a movement to throw some such works into every family in my circuit, as soon as I can see and know the right sort. There is now here great, unbounded apathy on the subject. We have been retrograding for several years. I believe these cheap little works, especially if they come periodically, say quarterly, will, combined with the fourth of July school celebrations, be the most efficient means of stirring the multitude.

The idea suggests itself to me that if such a journal were published quarterly, and a box of apparatus suitable to illustrate the sciences embraced in it, furnished with it, so that each would arrive about the same time, they would both be taken by schools—a given number of the journal, and one set of apparatus for a school. Thus for every 25 or 30 copies of the paper, one set of apparatus might be sold. If pains were taken to communicate a knowledge of the enterprise to every post office in the Union, and the thing done up cheaply, it would certainly succeed, and do more than all the learned essays that genius ever penned to promote popular education.

But in the wild woods of the West, one thing is wanting to give it success; and that is, teachers who would understand how to teach and illustrate. This could be remedied by sending out a few itinerant lecturers, with a full set of apparatus, to teach classes the use of them. I believe they would get well paid for their labor, and would, in a few weeks, qualify teachers enough in a county to learn, and then instruct the youth of the country. I am inclined to think that an itinerant system of lecturing on the use of astronomical, physiological, chemical, and mathematical apparatus would succeed. It would have all the outward appearance of humbuggery to give it attraction, and intrinsic merit to give it the patronage of men of sense and learning. A lecturer of this sort, with all the necessary apparatus, coming into a county, would in one month, prepare twenty sub-lecturers, who would supply themselves with a set of apparatus, and a sufficient number of the journal, and go into every neighborhood lecturing, and thus increasing the patronage of the work to an infinite extent, and creating everywhere, a thirst for knowledge.

You will excuse me for the too long, and perhaps too free letter I have written.

Respectfully, yours, &c.
A. CARUTHERS.

Carthage, Tenn. July 31, 1845.

A GREAT MOVEMENT.—The large but sensible plan in behalf of popular education given, in the above letter, bears strong marks of a wise judge. If all the judges in our land would unite with Judge Caruthers, in "using their influence upon the bench, in the social circle, and through the political journals," in throwing instruments of knowledge into "every family" in their respective districts, it would indeed be a great movement in favor of a great and common cause. Could they not thus confer a greater blessing upon their country by preventing, than by punishing criminals? J. HOLBROOK.

CONSIDERATIONS FOR THE COMMERCIAL COMMUNITY.

MR. EDITOR:—At a town meeting recently held in Birmingham, England, to remonstrate against a proposed increase of the British Navy, Joseph Sturge, a gentleman long and deeply interested in commerce, made the following statement: "I know something about chartering and insuring ships, and I do not hesitate to say, that if the whole of the navy were scuttled to-morrow, and sent to the bottom of the ocean, I could go to Lloyd's and insure ships and cargo, without paying one shilling more premium, and I could charter vessels to any port of the globe without paying any more freight." This bold and somewhat startling declaration, from such authority, has led me to see if it could be supported by the evidence of unerring statistics. I here present their testimony for the consideration of those of your readers who are engaged or interested in commercial pursuits.

The amount of tonnage owned by Great Britain, embracing every kind of vessel engaged in the domestic and foreign trade, is	3,047,178 tons.
The amount owned by the United States, is	2,158,602 "

The cost of American shipping, is $60 per ton: and an experienced ship-owner has estimated the value of our whole mercantile marine at $40 per ton, new and old. The cost of ship-building and its materials, are much lower in Great Britain; but admitting that all the mercantile shipping which that nation has afloat, is worth $40 per ton, then the value of British tonnage would be	$121,885,920

American do.	86,344,080
French, 389,619 tons	15,584,760
Value of the tonnage of the three nations.	$223,814,760

As the interest of capital invested in trade, ought not to be added into, but deducted from, the profits of that trade, in order to arrive at its precise net gain, we shall be admitting a very liberal profit to this amount of shipping, if we estimate it at 15 per cent. after deducting the interest of the capital employed. And we submit this estimation to any ship-owner, as one sufficiently high, for such an amount of tonnage, even if there were not one uninsured vessel lost on the ocean during the year. Then the net annual profit of all the shipping owned by Great Britain, the United States, and France, at 15 per cent. is $33,572,214.

Now, intelligent ship-merchants, will you not stick a pin at that fact? And, now, another at this? The appropriation of the British Government to their Navy, for the current year, is $33,620,200!!

Now I appeal to your sober convictions, if these two facts are not of some significance to the commercial world! Think of it, for a moment! The profit of the whole mercantile marine of these three great nations, falls short of the annual expense of supporting the British Navy! And is this the protection which Commerce owes to navies! Here are three great commercial nations expending annually fifty-two millions of dollars on their combined navy, whose principal function is to protect commerce and navigation; while all their mercantile shipping can earn, above its cost, is but a little more than thirty-three millions per annum! Look at France:—in 1837 she appropriated about $12,000,000, to her navy department, and she owned that year about 370,000 tons of shipping; which, at $40 per ton, was worth $12,800,000,—a trifle more than the cost of its protection!

But let us bring this matter nearer home. We have about 1,000,000 tons of shipping engaged in the foreign trade: the profit of which, at the rate we have taken, is $6,000,000 per annum. To protect this interest is almost the only avowed object of our navy: and to render it adequate to the service, the Government appropriated, for the current year, $6,350,789!!! Now, is not such a mountain load of naval protection like millstones about the neck of Commerce: a grevious burden to her canvass wings? Nations which do not own a single vessel of war, are underbidding those whose bullying, blustering navies whiten the ocean. And I will close this article with the words of an extensive ship-owner in this country, and which are singularly coincident with the declaration of Joseph Sturge:

"If we had not a single ship, we could receive and send away everything we wished to buy, and sell, by foreign vessels, which would do their own fighting: and, instead of charging our commerce with a farthing for naval protection, would carry all our freight at a cheaper rate than is now paid for the same service." CURIOUS DISCOVERY OF AN ANCIENT BIBLE.

A copy of the first complete edition of the English Bible, printed by Myles Coverdale, bearing the date 1435, was accidentally discovered, a short time since, in the false bottom of an old oak chest, at Holkham Hall, Norfolk, the seat of the Earl of Leicester.—There are numerous imperfect copies of this edition of the Holy Scriptures in existence, two being deposited in the library of the British Museum, one in the Bodlean Library at Oxford, one in the Cambridge University Library, and in fact most of the great libraries and public institutions in England, as well as many private individuals possessing the volume. The copy now brought to light, is the most valuable specimen of Myles Coverdale's labors hitherto known, being in every respect perfect, whereas all the other volumes enumerated are deficient of many leaves, both at the beginning and the end. The proprietor of Holkham has had the book appropriately bound and enclosed in an oaken box, and it now graces the shelves of his magnificent library. A London bookseller is said to have offered $500 for this bibliographical treasure.

"SPEAKING ABOUT GUNS."—"The doctor told us a good story the other day," says the Nashua Telegraph. "When the Rev. Mr.—— was ordained over the Old South Church in Boston, Dr. W—— preached the sermon. It was a capital one, and a copy was requested for the press, but the doctor declined. An old gentleman remarked that he would give a good deal to have it published, 'for,' said he, 'I have heard it now twelve times, and it grows five minutes longer every time—it is a wonderful sermon.'"

We have frequently, says the Germantown Telegraph, published the examination of classes at schools, in many instances very amusing; but never, we believe, anything as good as that which really occurred in a highly respectable school in Arch street, Philadelphia, last week. The teacher was examining a class in grammar, when he asked a lad, ten or twelve years of age, what part of speech Man was.

"A noun, Sir."

"What kind of a noun?"

"A bloody noun," was the instant reply.

"Master Henry will go down tail for his pertness."

TO PRESERVE FLOWERS THROUGHOUT THE WINTER.—Pluck the flowers when half-blown, and place them in a closely covered earthen vessel, dipping them, with the stalk downwards, in equal quantities of water and verjuice, mixed with a small quantity of bay salt. The vessel must be kept closed, and in a warm place; and then, if in the coldest day of winter the flowers be taken out, washed in cold water, and held before a gentle fire, they will open as if in their usual bloom.

CIRCULAR.

It is proposed to publish, in monthly numbers, a work entitled "THE KOSMIAN," containing a series of Letters, written from the United States, by Ahmed El Korah, to his friend in Algiers, translated from the original Showiah, by the author, and edited by FRANCES H. GREEN.

Ahmed's Letters virtually contain a History of the Anti-Slavery movement in this country, embracing a period of about twenty years: and they not only show the history of the times, but they illustrate the spiritual progress of the individual. Many interesting subjects are discussed in the course of the correspondence, such as the Condition of Seamen—of the Southern Slaves—of Northern Laborers—of the Industrial classes of Women—and of Domestic Servants—Party Spirit—Treatment of the Indians—and Cruelty to Animals—with a particular account of all the great Mobs, Riots, and other breaches of Law, which illustrate the pro-slavery spirit, and mark the progress of the Anti-Slavery enterprise.

The author has no party bias, whatever. He speaks as if under a peremptory obligation to utter the truth—being restrained by no bonds, whether sectarian or political. He utters his thoughts in the free out-pouring and confidence of bosom friendship; and we know that he is moved by a strong love of liberty—and of the race. His party is Humanity—his platform the wide world.

The Editor respectfully solicits encouragement in her arduous undertaking, trusting that the Friends of Freedom universally will promptly second her efforts; which nothing but the hope of doing good, could have suggested, or would sustain.

"THE KOSMIAN" will be published in numbers, of 32 pages each, octavo size, printed in fair type, on good paper, stitched together, and issued monthly, at the price of $1,00 a year, payable on the reception of the third number. Persons procuring five names, shall be entitled to six copies.

It is hoped that the friends to whom this Circular may be sent, will be regardful of its claims, and procure as many names as possible. They will please forward them to the subscriber, on or before the first of January next. The work will be issued as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall have been obtained.

Education and Industry!

THE Northampton Association of Education and Industry have appropriated a suitable tenement for the accommodation of 15 or 20 boarding pupils. They will be members of a family, under the care of the Director of Education, assisted by his wife, and other teachers, and will be subject to the same treatment and regulations as pupils who are members of the association. The name of the association indicates the idea of culture, towards the realization of which our efforts will be directed. Systematic, habitual industry is deemed indispensable to education, which should aim at the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual, moral, and religious tendencies in active, practical life.

We shall consider $100 a year as an equivalent for instruction and board; from which a suitable deduction will be made when a pupil comes for several years. The year will commence on the 1st of May, next, and will have no fixed and entire vacation. Pupils will be received for a year at any time.
